CATALOGUE OF MARKED SHERDS FROM KAHUN

Introduction

The structure of the catalogue was devised bearing in mind two essential considerations:

1. The importance of the pottery types on which the marks are inscribed, not only as a chronological indicator, but also as a means of understanding the significance of the marks. This is true especially for the marks incised before firing, as they might be related to the identity of the potter or of the workshop in which the pottery was made.

2. The necessity to keep the marks incised before firing separated from the ones incised after firing. The pre-firing marks were applied during the manufacturing process and are therefore certainly contemporary with the production of the vessels. The signs incised after firing were applied at some point during the life span of the sherds, possibly at the time of the Middle Kingdom phase of occupation of the town, but a New Kingdom or later date cannot be excluded. Moreover, the two types display a different character both in their shape and in their position on the vessel.

Consequently, the sherds are first arranged according to their pottery types and then divided into two sections:

- Marks incised before firing and on top of the rim
- Marks incised after firing

Within each section the signs are ordered according to the mark types as described in chapters 3 and 4. When a sherd is marked both before and after firing, it is listed among the sherds with pre-firing marks, but the post-firing mark type is also given. Not all the pottery types present in the corpus are incised with marks both before and after firing.

For each section, underneath the title, a concise description of the pottery type is given, with references to excavated parallels and proposed date.

For clarity, an outline of the pottery types follows.

2 Contrary to the usual practice I have listed closed forms before open shapes. This is due to the nature of the material under examination; the bulk of the corpus consist of closed shapes, mainly storage and ovoid jars in Marl C, and this influenced the system used to record and classify the sherds.

A few comments on the vessel descriptions given in the catalogue entries are necessary.

Museum number: This is the sherd number, which identifies each sherd. Museum Numbers beginning with 'EA' refer to sherds kept in the British Museum (Department of Egyptian Antiquities), while 'UC' and 'MM' refers respectively to the Petrie Museum of Egyptian Archaeology (University College London) and Manchester Museum (University of Manchester). When a single item bears more than one number it means that a joint was discovered after the sherds were registered.

A few sherds in the Petrie Museum of Egyptian Archaeology bear the same Museum number followed by a roman numeral (for example: UC 7623 I, UC 7623 II, UC 7623 III, etc.). This is because when part of the material was registered in the mid-sixties, Ms. Joyce Townend assigned the same museum number to all the sherds with the same mark type and a different roman numeral to each sherd in the group.
Pre-firing mark, Mark on top of rim and Post-firing mark. The mark type is given according to the codes listed in chapters 3 and 4 of the thesis, where a table is dedicated to each mark-type. The possible variants of the type are illustrated in the first column; the pottery types on which the marks occur are listed in the second. The third column gives the position of the marks on the vessel body, while the sherd number and the catalogue number are given for reference in the fourth column. Please refer to those chapters for an overview of the mark types.

Fabric: I have used the 'Vienna System' as parameters for the fabrics' classification.

Description: I have repeated for each item the general description of the pottery type, including the shape of the rim and the base, even if the piece under discussion is just a shoulder- or a body-sherd. As already seen in the chapter on the pottery typology, the body-sherds have been assigned to the various types on the basis of fabric, technique of vessel manufacture, surface treatment, and wall thickness. Only when a substantial portion of a diagnostic feature is present, was a body-sherd ascribed to a more specific subgroup.

The appearance of the section is described (if uniform or zoned), but no attempt was made to define the colour of each single break and to include references to the Munsell Soil Colour Charts. Please refer to the chapter on the pottery typology for a more detailed description of the fabrics.

Measurements: the following abbreviations have been used:

H. = height. When dealing with body-sherds, the height was taken with calipers, and the orientation decided on the basis of the rilling marks.

W. = width. It is used only with body-sherd and was taken at the point of maximum width, with calipers, and the orientation decided on the basis of the rilling marks.

D. = diameter of the rim or the base. The measurement was taken with a diameter chart, and refers to the point where the sherd touches the chart, not to the exterior of the rim.

T. = thickness of the vessel wall.

References: I have included in this item references to Petrie’s published and unpublished papers, as well as any other bibliographical reference known to me concerning that particular sherd/mark.

As for the references to Petrie’s work, a few points need to be highlighted. The standard to which Petrie published the marks varies considerably between the first and the second season of excavation. The great majority of the marks found during the first season (April to May 1889) are published as copies in K.G.H. (1890), pl. XXVII, and are often accompanied by short explanatory notes (for example ’P’ to indicate that the mark was incised before firing; or ’pit in floor’ and ’find 58’ to indicate provenance). At the end of the second season (October 1889 to January 1890), Petrie did not have time to prepare copies of all the marks he found, and in I.K.G. pl. XV he only gave a ‘hand list of the forms for purpose of study’. As a consequence, while it is relatively easy to identify the marks excavated during the first season with the drawings given in the publication, for the sherds found in the second season we can only refer generally to the mark type.

This is even more disappointing if we consider the different histories of the two groups of sherds after their arrival in England. In 1890 Jesse Haworth presented the Greek and Roman Department of the British Museum with a group of objects retrieved during Petrie’s excavations at Kahun and Gurob, including the sherds with marks. Following Petrie’s suggestion, the sherds were left unregistered in the event that similar material would be found during the work planned for the next season. In 1912 the objects were entered in the Greek & Roman registers and in 1926 parts of the original gift were transferred to the Department of Egyptian Antiquities. In 1994 the material in the Greek and Roman Department was reviewed again, and the remaining Egyptian items were transferred to the Egyptian department of the same Museum, where they were finally registered. A careful comparison with Petrie’s publications revealed that the group of marked sherds of Middle Kingdom date now in the British Museum was excavated during the first season of work at Kahun.

2 Petrie’s letter to Mr. Murray, dated 25 September 1889.
Petrie kept part of the finds for himself, and they are now in the Petrie Museum of Egyptian Archaeology at University College London. Excluding a few items registered in the mid-sixties by Mrs. Joyce Townend, the bulk of the marked sherds from Kahun and Gurob was left unregistered until 1995, when they became the subject of the present research. Due to the complex history of the Petrie collection and the many moves to which the Museum has been subjected in the past, we cannot exclude the possibility that sherds from other sites were accidentally incorporated into the Kahun/Gurob material. The concise way in which Petrie published the marks found in the second season does not help in the identification of the over two hundreds sherds kept at University College. Luckily more information can be gained from Petrie’s Miss Notebooks.

As already seen in the chapter on Petrie’s excavation at Kahun, amongst his Miss Notebooks, four show plans of the town (39b, 49, 48a, 48), and two contain drawings and notes on the sherds with marks: nos. 39e and 50, dated respectively to the first and the second season. Once again the recording was more accurate and detailed during the first season, when, besides the drawing of each mark, in Miss Notebook 39e, Petrie added a concise note referring to the kind of pottery on which the mark is incised, and to the position in which it was found. At the very beginning of Miss Notebook 39e there is also an introductory note with the explanation of some of the annotation used in the following pages, as follows:

Pottery marks from Kahun
- Potter's marks "P"7
- approximate scale 1 inch8
- similar marks ranged together
- all pot right way up, if perhaps inverted ↓, if doubtful any way *
- "white speck" pottery as Tell Amarna on paste quite unknown after Ramessides9
- "red" red paste
- "red face" painted red10
- XII from or about, not known later
- "surface" laying on surface of ground
- "high" but little under surface
- 1/2 down
- "low" low down in filling of chambers
- "floor" on the floor
- "floor pit" pit in floor of chambers filled with stuff & rubbish

In this catalogue those annotations are listed in brackets after the reference to the page number; e.g. Petrie, Miss Notebook 39e, p. 1 (red).

In Miss Notebook 50 (second season), the marks are drawn and grouped according to their shape, but very few comments were added. Nevertheless, the comparison between the drawings given in Notebook 50 and the sherds kept in the Petrie Museum has shown that the majority of the sherds were excavated during the second season.

Comments: 'The sherd has been analysed': in 1984 Mrs. Joan Huntoon11 took samples from a few Kahun sherds as part of a large-scale study of Middle Bronze Age pottery with the help of neutron activation analysis. The study was primarily based on samples taken from amphorae and Tell el Yahudiyeh ware vessels excavated at Tell el Dab’a,12 but also includes samples from sites in Syria, Lebanon, Jordan and Israel, and from various Egyptian sites, ranging in date from the Old to the New Kingdom.13 The premature

Pottery type I.1.a.
Marks incised before firing
Large storage jars in Marl Cl. Body-sherds that cannot be ascribed to a more specific sub-type.

1. Museum number: EA 74645
   Object: pottery vessel, fragment
   Pottery type: I.1.a.
   Pre-firing mark: 19
   Fabric: Marl Cl
   Description: shoulder-sherd possibly from a large storage jar. Pre-firing mark incised on shoulder, below base of rim. The section is zoned red with black core; surface uncoated. The interior is eroded.
   Measurements: W. 13.3; T. 0.75
   References: Petrie, Mss Notebook 39e, p. 18 (P).
   Comments: mark not published in Petrie, K.G.H. (1890). The sherd was transferred from the Dept. of Greek and Roman Antiquities in 1994; it was not registered there but presumably arrived with the other sherds with marks in 1912.

2. Museum number: UC 7625 I
   Object: pottery vessel, fragment
   Pottery type: I.1.a.
   Pre-firing mark: 2.1
   Post-firing mark: a 3.11
   Fabric: Marl Cl
   Description: body-sherd possibly from a large storage jar. Pre-firing and post-firing marks incised on exterior. The section is zoned, red with black core; surface uncoated and blackened by fire.

Comments: For the mark type cf. Spencer A.J., Excavation at El-Ashmunein III, the Town, London 1993, p 86, pl. 111, 9 1 1: "the sherds from a large jar with an mark incised on the shoulder, from the fill to the north of Grave 1, ( ...) Another sherd with the same mark, found in the German excavation at Ashmunein, is described by Roeder in Hermopolis 1929-1939, p 328 (n. 455/1), but is unfortunately not illustrated. This example was discovered at the 280-290 metrepoint along the trench, Graben II with a vase of clear Middle Kingdom type, mis-dated to a later period in the publication. The marked sherd from the British Museum excavation came from the field above the superstructure of Grave 13 to the North of the vaulted chamber of Grave 1, and was found with a fragment of a potstand of Type 5.1.30, for which there are Middle Kingdom parallels."

Marks incised before firing and on top of rim

Large wide-mouthed, flat-based storage jars with short rim. The best parallels for this type were found in the so-called 'South-Wall Deposit 1' and 'South wall deposit 2' at Lisht. The deposits are securely dated to the middle of the reign of Senwosret I. Similar specimens are found at Qasr el-Sagha, Dahshur, Haraga, Tell el-Dab'a, and Abu Ghalib. In the Memphis-Fayum region this type was in very common use by the mid-12th dynasty. It is still attested in Dahshur in the so-called 'complex 6' dated from the late 12th to early 13th dynasty At Kom Rabi'a (Memphis) rim-shards of this type are found residually in late 13th dynasty strata, probably because they were often reused as pot-stands. At Tell el-Dab'a it is present in levels d/2-1, and c, which cover the period from late 12th to middle 13th dynasty.

Comments: I have placed this sherd at the end of the sequence because I am inclined to consider it either decoration or part of a much bigger mark, impossible to relate to any of the ones present in the catalogue.
Pottery type L1.a.1.
Marks incised after firing

Large wide-mouthed, flat-based storage jars with short rim. The best parallels for this type were found in the so-called 'South-Wall Deposit 1' and 'South wall deposit 2' at Lisht. The deposits are securely dated to the middle of the reign of Senwosret I. Similar specimens are found at Qasr el-Sagha, Dahshur, Haragah, Tell el-Dab'a, and Abu Ghalib. In the Memphis-Fayum region this type was in very common use by the mid-12th dynasty. It is still attested at Dahshur in the so-called 'complex 6' dated from the late 12th to early 13th dynasty. At Kom Rabi'a (Memphis) rim-shears of the type are found residually in late 13th dynasty strata, probably because they were often reused as pot-stands. At Tell el-Dab'a it is present in levels d/2-1, and c, which cover the period from late 12th to middle 13th dynasty.

Pottery type I.1.a.2.
Marks incised before firing and on top of rim

Large wide-mouthed storage jars with externally folded, modelled rim and flat base. Vessels of this type are found at Lisht, in a rubbish dump of settlement origin, above the so-called transportation road in the south-east area of the cemetery. The excavators suggest that the pottery from this context provides a link between the pottery found at the funerary complex of Senwosret I and the pottery from Dahshur (reign of Amenemhat III onwards). At Kom Rabi'a (Memphis) rim-shards of the type are present in middle 13th dynasty strata, and at Tell el-Dab'a they are attested in levels c and b/3-1 ranging from the middle 13th dynasty to the middle of the 15th. At Qasr el-Sagha the type is found both in the western and eastern settlements. Specimens are also found in Upper Egypt, at Karnak-North, in contexts dated to the Second Intermediate Period.

Pottery type I.1.a.2.

Marks incised after firing

Large wide-mouthed storage jars with externally folded, modelled rim and flat base. Vessels of this type are found at Lisht, in a rubbish dump of settlement origin, above the so-called transportation road in the south-east area of the cemetery. The excavators suggest that the pottery from this context provides a link between the pottery found at the funerary complex of Senwosret I and the pottery from Dahshur (reign of Amenemhat III onwards). At Kom Rab’a (Memphis), rim-shards of the type are present in middle 13th dynasty strata, and at Tell el-Dab’a they are attested in levels c and b3-I ranging from the middle 13th dynasty to the middle of the 15th. At Qasr el-Sagha, the type is found both in the western and eastern settlements. Specimens are also found in Upper Egypt, at Karnak-North, in contexts dated to the Second Intermediate Period.

Grave 1, (.....) Another sherd with the same mark, found in the German excavation at Ashmunein, is described by Roeder in Hermopolis 1929-1939, p. 328 (n. 455/1), but is unfortunately not illustrated. This example was discovered at the 280-290 metrampoint along the trench, Graben II, with a vase of clear Middle Kingdom type, mis-dated to a later period in the publication. The marked sherd from the British Museum excavation came from the field above the superstructure of Grave 13, to the North of the vaulted chamber of Grave 1, and was found with a fragment of a potstand of Type 5.1.30, for which there are Middle Kingdom parallels. The sherd has been analysed.

Marks incised before firing and on top of rim

Large wide-mouthed storage jars, with externally folded and elongated rectangular rim; top of rim flattened by tool; flat base. Similar vessels have been found at Dahshur1 amongst the pottery in the dump over the silos in the valley temple area (complex 7), dated by Dorothea Arnold to the middle/late 13th dynasty. They are also attested at Qasr el-Sagha,2 Lisht North (middle/late 13th dynasty),3 Kom Rabi'a (Memphis, late 13th dynasty),4 and Tell el-Dab'a (middle 13th to middle 15th dynasty).5 They have been found in great quantity in the Middle Bronze Age/hyksos settlement at Tell el-Maskhuta (middle of the 13th to the late 15th dynasty),6 where they apparently constituted the most common type of storage vessel.

Pottery type L1.a.4.
Marks incised after firing

Large wide-mouthed storage jars, with externally folded and elongated rectangular rim; top of rim flattened by tool; flat base. Similar vessels have been found at Dahshur\(^1\) amongst the pottery in the dump over the silos in the valley temple area (complex 7), dated by Dorothea Arnold to the middle/late 13th dynasty. They are also attested at Qasr el-Sagha,\(^2\) Liath North (middle/late 13th dynasty),\(^3\) Kom Rab'a (Memphis, late 13th dynasty),\(^4\) and Tell el-Dab a (middle 13th to middle 15th dynasty).\(^5\) They have been found in great quantity in the Middle Bronze Age/Hyksos settlement at Tell el-Maskhuta (middle of the 13th to the late 15th dynasty),\(^6\) where they apparently constituted the most common type of storage vessel.

Pottery type 1.1.w.
Marks incised before firing

Jugs. Already recorded by Petne, K.G.H. (1890), pl. XII, 18, this type does not seem to be very common. Four specimens are known from Tell el-Dab a, where the type is attested from stratum c (= G3 - 1) to b/3 (= F).\(^1\) (reign of Senwosret III - late 13th dynasty) It is also worth noting part of a handle found at Kom Rab a (Memphis) in a middle/late 13th dynasty context.\(^2\) 322.

Object: pottery vessel
Pottery type: 1.1.w.
Pre-firing mark: 3.9.4
Fabric: Marl C1

Description: complete vessel in form of a jug. The rim is direct and flaring. The handle, almost circular in section, is hand-made and attached from the rim to the shoulder. The bottom of the oval base is higher than the ring (pinched) around it, so that the vase does not stand properly. Pre-firing mark incised on shoulder; surface uncoated. Rim thrown and joined on to the coil-made body below base of neck; marks of finger-smoothing inside; below joining line The interior of the vessel is covered with residue of content or dirt.
Measurements: H. 25.1; D. 10.4; T 0.6

Pottery type I.1.c.1.
Marks incised before firing

Large ovoid bottles with externally folded, short rim, and corrugated-neck. Already recorded by Petrie K.G.H, pl. XII, 11 and Engelbach, Haraeh, pl. XXXVIII, 40M, this type is found at Dahshur,1 Lisht South,2 Lisht North,3 Qasr el-Sagha,4 Tell el-Maskhuta,5 and Tell el-Dab’a.6 Examples are also found in the Nubian fortresses, at Askut7 and at the Kerma cemetery of Ulom West8 Used as water and wine jars for cult purposes, this type is dated from the reign of Amenemhat III well into the Second Intermediate Period.9 At Tell el-Dab’a they virtually disappear in stratum D/3, at the end of the 15th dynasty.10

Pottery type I.1.c.1.
Marks incised after firing

Large ovoid bottles with externally folded, short rim, and corrugated-neck. Already recorded by Petne K.G.H., pl XII, 11 and Engelbach, Herapeh, pl XXXVIII, 46M, this type is found at Dahshur, Lisht South, Lisht North, Qasr el-Sagha, Tell el-Maskhuta, and Tell el-Dab'a. Examples are also found in the Nubian fortresses, at Askut, and at the Kerma cemetery of Ukme West. Used as water and wine jars for cult purposes, this type is dated from the reign of Amenemhat III well into the Second Intermediate Period. At Tell el-Dab'a they virtually disappear in stratum D/3, at the end of the 15th dynasty.

Spencer A.J., Excavation at El-Ashmunein III, the Town, London 1993, p.68, pl. 111, 9.1.1: 'the sherds from a large jar with an incised mark on the shoulder, from the fill to the north of Grave 1, (.....) Another sherd with the same mark, found in the German excavation at Ashmunein, is described by Roeder in Hermopolis 1929-1939, p. 328 (n. 455/1), but is unfortunately not illustrated. This example was discovered at the 260-290 metrepont along the trench, Graben II, with a vase of clear Middle Kingdom type, mis-dated to a later period in the publication. The marked sherd from the British Museum excavation came from the field above the superstructure of Grave 13, to the North of the vaulted chamber of Grave 1, and was found with a fragment of a potstand of Type 5.1.30, for which there are Middle Kingdom parallels.'

Comments: in the Greek and Roman register the mark is identified with Petrie, K.G.H. (1890), pl. XXVII, 21, and they are very similar. However fabric and technology suggest for the sherd a New Kingdom date. From Petrie's published and unpublished material we know that the mark pl XXVII, 21 was found with other object in a pit in the floor of a room in Rank A. Petrie, K.G.H. (1890), p. 29: 'another exquisite lion's-head handle with an amethyst scarab was found in a hole in the floor of a room in rank A, and is now in the Boulak Museum'; ibid. p. 43 'in a pit in the floor of a room was found a beautiful spoon handle with a lion's head, and a plain amethyst scarab, both in the XIith dynasty style, and a potsherd marked (21)'. Petrie, Mss Notebook 39e, (white speck, floor pit with XII pottery); ibid. p. 46, plan of rank A with location of pit 50. In Petrie Mss. Journal 8-15 April 1889, p. 95, is the report of the find. EA 74367 has 'Low' incised inside. If the sherd were to be identified with pl. XXVII, 21, I would expect to find 'pit in floor'.

Marks incised before firing and on top of rim

Large wide-mouthed, flat-based storage jars with short rim. The best parallels for this type were found in the so-called 'South-Wall Deposit 1' and 'South wall deposit 2' at Lisht. The deposits are securely dated to the middle of the reign of Senwosret I. Similar specimens are found at Qasr el-Sagha, Dahshur, Haragah, Tell el-Dab'a, and Abu Ghalib in the Memphis-Fayum region this type was in very common use by the mid-12th dynasty. It is still attested at Dahshur in the so-called 'complex 6' dated from the late 12th to early 13th dynasty. At Kom Rabi'a (Memphis) rim-shards of this type are found residually in late 13th dynasty strata, probably because they were often reused as pot-stands. At Tell el-Dab'a it is present in levels d/2-1, and c, which cover the period from late 12th to middle 13th dynasty. The vessels in Marl C2 belong to the same pottery tradition and style as those in Marl C1, but the difference in fabric may suggest a different area of production. Janine Bourau has proposed that Marl C2 became more common from the late 13th dynasty onwards.

Comments in the notebook Petne drew, as belonging to the same vessel, the pre-firing and the post-firing marks, but not the one on top of the rim. In K.G.H. he published the complete post-firing mark and only part of the pre-firing (the single stroke at the top is missing). The two strokes on top of the rim are again not illustrated. The sherd has been analysed.

Marks incised before firing

Large wide-mouthed storage jars with externally folded, modelled rim and flat base. Vessels of this type are found at Lisht, in a rubbish dump of settlement origin, above the so-called transportation road in the south-east area of the cemetery. The excavators suggest that the pottery from this context provides a link between the pottery found at the funerary complex of Senwosret I and the pottery from Deir el-Medina (reign of Amenemhat III onwards). At Kom Rabi a (Memphis) rim-sherd of this type are present in middle 13th dynasty strata, and at Tell el-Dab a they are attested in levels c and b3-1 ranging from the middle 13th dynasty to the middle of the 15th. At Qasr el-Sagha the type is found both in the western and eastern settlements. Specimens are also found in Upper Egypt, at Kom Rabi a, and at Tell el-Dab a in levels c and b13-1 ranging from the middle 13th dynasty to the middle of the 15th. At Qasr el-Sagha the type is found both in the western and eastern settlements. Specimens are also found in Upper Egypt, at Kom Rabi a, and at Tell el-Dab a in levels c and b13-1 ranging from the middle 13th dynasty to the middle of the 15th. Marks incised after firing

Large wide-mouthed storage jars with externally folded, modelled rim and flat base. Vessels of this type are found at Lisht, in a rubbish dump of settlement origin, above the so-called transportation road in the south-east area of the cemetery. The excavators suggest that the pottery from this context provides a link between the pottery found at the funerary complex of Senwosret I and the pottery from Dahshur (reign of Amenemhat III onwards) at Kom Rabia (Memphis).

The type are present in middle 13th dynasty strata, and at Tell el-Dab they are attested in levels c and b3-1 ranging from the middle 13th dynasty to the middle of the 15th. At Qasr el-Sagha the type is found both in the western and eastern settlements. Specimens are also found in Upper Egypt, at Karnak-North, in contexts dated to the Second Intermediate Period. The vessels in Marl C2 belong to the same pottery tradition and style as those in Marl C1, but the difference in fabric may suggest a different area of production. Janine Bourriau has proposed that Marl C2 became more common from the late 13th dynasty onwards.

Marks incised before firing and on top of rim

Large wide-mouthed storage jars, with externally folded and elongated rectangular rim, top of rim flattened by tool, flat base. Similar vessels have been found at Dahshur amongst the pottery in the dump over the silos in the valley temple area (complex 7), dated by Dorothea Arnold to the middle-late 13th dynasty. They are also attested at Qasr el-Sagha, Liath North (middle-late 13th dynasty), Kom Rab'a (Memphis, late 13th dynasty), and Tell el-Dab'a (middle 13th to middle 15th dynasty). They have been found in great quantity in the Middle Bronze Age/Hyksos settlement at Tell el-Maskhuta (middle of the 13th to the late 15th dynasty), where they apparently constituted the most common type of storage vessel. The vessels in Marl C2 belong to the same pottery tradition and style as those in Marl C1, but the difference in fabric may suggest a different area of production. Janine Bourniau has proposed that Marl C2 became more common from the late 13th dynasty onwards.

Pottery type I.2.b.2.
Marks incised after firing

Small-sized ovoid jars with externally folded rim. The vessels in Marl C2 belong to the same pottery tradition and style as those in Marl C1, but the difference in fabric may suggest a different area of production. Janine Bourlaux has proposed\(^1\) that Marl C2 became more common from the late 13th dynasty onwards.

Pottery type I.2.c.1.

Marks incised before firing

Large ovoid bottles with externally folded, short rim, and corrugated-neck. Already recorded by Petrie K.G.H., pl. XII, 11 and Engelbach, Haregeh, pl. XXXVIII, 46M, this type is found at Dahshur, 1 Liash South, 2 Liash North, 3 Qasr el-Sagha, 4 Tell el-Maskhuta, 5 and Tell el-Dab'a. 6 Examples are also found in the Nubian fortresses, at Askut 7 and at the Kerma cemetery of Umma West. 8 Used as water and wine jars for cult purposes, this type is dated from the reign of Amenemhat III well into the Second Intermediate Period. 9 At Tell el-Dab'a they virtually disappear in stratum D/3, at the end of the 15th dynasty. 10 The vessels in Mari C2 belong to the same pottery tradition and style as those in Mari C1, but the difference in fabric may suggest a different area of production. Janine Bourriau has proposed 11 that Mari C2 became more common from the late 13th dynasty onwards.

501.
Object: pottery vessel, fragment
Pottery type: I.2.c.1.
Pre-firing mark: 1.11
Fabric: Marl C2
Description: shoulder-sherd with part of the rim, from a large ovoid bottle with externally folded, short rim, and corrugated-neck. Pre-firing mark incised on shoulder. The section is uniform in colour; surface uncoated. Rim and upper-shoulder thrown and joined on to the coil-made body ca. 7 cm below base of neck; marks of finger-smoothing inside, below joining line. The hand-made part of the sherd is much thicker (1.2 cm) than the rest (0.6 cm).
Measurements: H. 19.5; T. 0.6 to 1.2
References: Petrie, Mss Notebook 39e, p. 11 (P, red).
Comments: mark not published in Petrie, K.G.H. (1890). The sherd was transferred from the Dept. of Greek and Roman Antiquities in 1994; it was not registered there but presumably arrived with the other sherds with marks in 1912. The rim is badly broken and too eroded to obtain reliable measurements and stance; only the mark was drawn. The sherd has been analysed.

Pottery type I.2.h.
Marks incised before firing

'Fish dishes'. At Dahshur they have been found only in the rubbish fill over the valley temple area, which the excavators date to the later part of the 13th dynasty. Other examples are from Lisht North, Qasr el-Sagha, Kom Rabî'a (Memphis), and Tell el-Dab'a, all in midlate 13th dynasty settlement contexts. Generally we can safely say that these dishes started to be used after the end of the 12th dynasty and their use continued in the Second Intermediate Period.

Comments: For the mark type cf. Spencer A.J., Excavation at El-Ashmunein III, the Town, London 1993, p.68, pl. 111, 9 1.1: 'the sherds from a large jar with an mark incised on the shoulder, from the fill to the north of Grave 1, (.....) Another sherd with the same mark, found in the German excavation at Ashmunen, is described by Roeder in Hermopolis 1929-1939, p. 328 (n. 455/1), but is unfortunately not illustrated. This example was discovered at the 280-290 metrepont along the trench, Graben II, with a vase of clear Middle Kingdom type, ms-dated to a later period in the publication. The marked sherd from the British Museum excavation came from the field above the superstructure of Grave 13, to the North of the vaulted chamber of Grave 1, and was found with a fragment of a potstand of Type 5.1. 30, for which there are Middle Kingdom parallels.'

Marks incised before firing

Body-sherds from closed forms. Their ware and shape suggests an identification with the common Nile C bottles,\(^1\) wheel-made, covered with a thick red slip, and sometimes decorated with black bands around the neck (starting from late in the reign of Amenemhat III). This kind of bottle (called also water or beer-jars in the literature) is characteristic of the Memphite-Fayum region, but is also found in Upper Egypt and Nubia, possibly as the result of trade.

Offering stand. This is a very specialised type, incorporating a dish or a cannated bowl and a pot-stand, the base of the stand can be open or closed. This type seems to have been quite common at Kahun: Petrie, K.G.H. (1890), pl. XII, 17; Petrie, I.K.G. (1891), pl. IV, 18; Petrie, Brunton, Murray, Lahun II (1923), pl. LVIII, type 90. Two examples were found, broken, in the layer above the jars in the South-wall Deposit 1 at Lisht, dated by the excavators to the later years of Senwosret I. Similar types have been found in settlements at Dahshur, Lipht North, and Kom Raba (Memphis), always in 13th dynasty or later contexts. Examples are known also in Mari C1.

Pottery type II.1.r.
Marks incised after firing

Bread-moulds, hand-made, possibly pressed over a core, in a sandy Nile C fabric. The shape is typical of the Middle Kingdom: a long slender tube, flaring at the top the bottom is flat and usually pinched with the fingers all around. The base often shows a hole, made on purpose before firing. The exterior surface is rough, while the interior is smoothed by the application of purified clay. This type of bread-mould was in use from the end of the First Intermediate Period, through the Middle Kingdom until the 18th dynasty.

Pottery type II.4.v.
Marks incised before firing and on top of rim

Cooking bowls. They are quite common at Qasr el-Sagha, where examples in a Nile clay with an unusually large addition of sand (possibly Nile E), are found only in the so-called complex 7, dated to the late 13th dynasty, and at Lisht North, same date. At Tell el-Maskhuta they appear to be characteristic of the Middle Bronze IIB and C period, i.e. from the late 13th dynasty throughout the Hyksos Period in Egypt. At Kom el-Rabi'a (Memphis) they are present in various fabrics: sandy version of Nile B2, Nile C, and Nile E. Janine Bourriau has suggested that, in opposition to the locally made Nile B2 and Nile C examples, the specimens in Nile E were possibly imported from the eastern Delta. This is based on the assumption that the rounded sand grains used in its fabric as a temper originate in the Delta Gezlas. This possibility needs further investigation.

Object: pottery vessel, fragment
Pottery type: II.4 v.
Mark on top rim: 4.3.1.1
Fabric: Nile E
Description: rim-sherd from a cooking bowl with in-turned whole mouth rim. Pre-firing mark incised on top rim. The section is uniform in colour; surface uncoated and blackened by fire. Wheel-made. Diameter uncertain.

Comments: mark not published in Petrie, K.G.H. (1890). The sherd was transferred from the Dept. of Greek and Roman Antiquities in 1994; it was not registered there but presumably arrived with the other sherds with marks in 1912.
