Beach life

The great British beach is for so many of us soaked with memories and meanings, of family, fun and promise. A few short weeks a year it comes to life and fizzes with inter-generational sound and life. For the rest of the year it is a strange slightly haunted, often desolate, frequently tacky, but strangely beautiful place. They are urban but also natural, real and a little surreal, sometimes thriving but more often just hanging in there. They are quintessential public space. Some will live and some will die. Do we choose beach life?

Prof Matthew Carmona
The Bartlett school of Planning, UCL