Common Law Courts:
The Judiciary as a Regulatory Mechanism

JACOB J. MEAGHER*

Constitutional law is the law of the powers and responsibilities of the main branches of government, and of the relationship among them; constitutional law is the law of human rights and freedoms. Under this understanding of constitutional law, there is constitutional law even without a written constitution. The relevant question is: ...What is the court’s contribution? What problems does this contribution pose for the courts? How is the judicial discretion exercised?1

The Hon. Justice Aharon Barak, Supreme Court of Israel (May 1987)

This article suggests that courts regulate constitutional rights. As such, some may attribute to its author little in the way of revolutionary legal scholarship. “Do Courts regulate?” appears to the uninitiated to be a rhetorical question because when courts make decisions, and decisions are regulations, then courts must be regulators. The syllogistic answer to the above question is superficially yes: courts are regulators and “so what”?2 However, therein lies an overlooked consideration: although courts do regulate, what is meant by regulation in the judicial context and where does that power originate? What exactly do courts regulate? Is this a legitimate exercise, or a mislabeling of judicial activism?3 Courts will regulate at certain times; not all decisions are regulations; some decisions are in a constitutional or rights class and are further identifiable as a “lis of distinction”4 in their regulatory import. A judicial regulatory mechanism exists which can further rebut the rhetorical sentiment – “do courts regulate”? This article considers the judiciary as a regulatory mechanism

---

2 The syllogism suffers from a fatal flaw and the question is no longer rhetorical. A syllogism is a form of deductive argument based on a conclusion following from two (or more), asserted or assumed truthful – although not necessarily so – propositions.
4 Lis or lis pendens meaning a lawsuit or formal notice of pending legal action: John Gray, Lawyers’ Latin: A Vade Mecum (2006). A lis of distinction is a phrase coined to describe and demarcate a lis of particular importance to common law courts as regulators’ theory; for example “there are many lis’, but few lis’ of distinction in relation to rights regulation”.

* LL.B.(first class honours), Victoria University of Wellington, New Zealand; Barrister and Solicitor of the High Court of New Zealand; former Legal and Policy Advisor, New Zealand Law Commission; Ph.D. Candidate, University of Cambridge.

108 JCL 12:1
and acknowledges the existence of an unsubstantiated norm that common law courts, just as other classical regulators, regulate directly. The judiciary regulates specifically in the rights and constitutional arena wider than the lis in particular inter se disputes. I turn to four illustrations, comparative jurisprudence, and the descriptive reasoning necessary to advance a new theory in regulatory law.

Throughout this exposition rights-based constitutionalism is explored from a regulatory perspective. It is argued that traditional common law and judicial conceptualizations of the legal system and Constitution of New Zealand are regulatory in nature. The courts’ regulatory mechanism is the protection of aggregate, often fundamental, rights through legal actions - the lis - which affects society much more widely than the individual lis between inter partes. Courts can regulate social rights en masse via a lis of distinction. An “essential difference is that the ambit of judicial law-making is narrower than that of parliamentary law-making”, and the judiciary is identified as specifically regulating fundamental and constitutional rights as a legitimate function. The judiciary manages the domain of rights as a regulatory exercise: “the legislative role of the Courts is interstitial … [t]hey effect just and efficient legislative outcomes in ways that reconcile the institutional values of the legal system”. The judicial regulatory mechanism is only identifiable with an understanding of the inherent political nature of law and the judicial enterprise, which this article explores.

In summary, a new regulatory theory ascribed to the courts and judiciary is herein proposed, where they are a regulatory mechanism. They regulate rights with a broad mandate between parties: in society; aggregate rights; human rights, and Bill of Rights 1990 rights. Courts are not judicial activists or judicial supremacists, in the pejorative sense, as there is a “fundamental political-judicial dialogue that secures the constitutional balance” as evidenced though the judicial regulatory mechanism explored in this article. In other words, common law courts, as rights regulators, serve a legitimate function within the common law world. Courts regulate conduct more generally than the State v Citizen lis, so that in a lis of distinction, by adjudicating a rights dispute between A v B, the judiciary make social policy precedent far wider than the inter se/inter partes dispute before them. This is a new theory in regulatory discourse; the judiciary as, or exercising, a distinct regulatory mechanism. No effort is made here to provide direct rebuttal to skeptics of common-law constitutionalism or Bill of Rights interpretation. Orthodox theorists may always ascribe some illegitimacy to constitutional/supremacy regulation by the judiciary, and the orthodoxy fails to address a legitimate reproach to its attack on constitutionalism.

---

5 Inter se or inter partes meaning between the parties or amongst themselves. See Gray, ibid.
7 Ibid., p. 345.
8 Ibid.
10 Joseph, note 6 above, p. 345.
11 For the definition of “lis of distinction”, see note 4 above.
12 For an example of the debate erring on the side against common-law constitutionalists, see Ekins, note 9 above.
This exposition presents regulatory motivations which are neither activist nor supremacist in nature thus making this new theory worthy of exploration.

OUTLOOK ON THE CLASSICAL REGULATORS

Outside the wide folds of the Commerce Act 198614 “courts as regulator” appears an unwieldy concept, insofar as the regulatory body, the courts, are not directed to regulate, mandated or ascribed regulatory powers in a demarcated area such as the Commerce Commission. Common law Courts must wait for a lis to be brought. They cannot regulate or investigate of their own accord like many traditional regulators or some Civil law inquisitorial courts.15 The Commerce Commission is a classical regulator. It undertakes agency activity regulating prices under its Act16 and is distinct from broader notions of regulation. It exists in its own “regulatory area” with “boundaries which demarcate regulatory space...encompassing a range of regulatory issues in a community”.17 Whereas courts regulate our private and public or state interactions through tort, contract and administrative law, having superior jurisdiction over the “general laws”.18 In New Zealand and other common law jurisdictions, one does not normatively speak of regulation by the courts, due to their unrestricted demarcation/jurisdiction over all law. On the contrary. The courts, like the Commerce Commission, have exceedingly wide regulatory reach when a lis is brought before it; both can be omnipresent regulators, with their reach touching on almost all areas of society.19 Here we focus in particular on judicial regulation of rights and constitutional norms as a demarcated area.

In a Legal Systems course,20 to answer the question “what do courts do?” with the statement, “they regulate” at first glance demonstrates a fundamental misunderstanding 14 Part 1 focusing on the Commerce Commission; Part 2, on Restrictive trade practices; Part 3, on Acquisitions; Part 4, on Regulated goods and services.

17 Ayres and Braithwaite, “Responsive Regulation”, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, pp. 63-64.
18 When the term “courts” is used in this article, reference is being made to the members of the High Court bench and above. Members of the District Court bench are of “inferior jurisdiction” and their powers stem from statute not the common law – although this does not mean they cannot regulate: see District Court Act 1947, s 29; and Judicature Act 1908, s 2 definition of “inferior court”. All judges of the High Court, Court of Appeal, and Supreme Court have a general supervisory jurisdiction stemming from common law; those courts are constituted as supreme courts of judicature: Judicature Act 1908, s 16.
19 Commerce Act 1986, s 1A: “The purpose of this Act is to promote competition in markets for the long-term benefit of consumers within New Zealand”. The Commission has wide scope in order to achieve that aim; for example, Part 2 “Restrictive Trade Practices” which can apply to both small and large business.
20 The simplest explanation of a legal system is often the most telling and informative, it starts with the basic building blocks, such as rule of law and the separation of powers. At Victoria University of Wellington the course is entitled “LAWS121 Introduction to New Zealand Legal System”. At the University of Auckland the paper is “LAWS121G Law and Society” both having Grant Morris, Law Alive: The New Zealand Legal System in Context (3d ed.; 2015) as the recommended text. It was with the first edition of that book and the fourteenth edition of Glanville Williams, Learning the Law, ed. A. T. H. Smith (2010) that my legal education began. Learning the Law is now in its fifteenth edition; first published in 1945, it has been a staple text in the Common Law universities most notable for coining the topic of “the English Legal System”: Peter Clinch, Teaching Legal Research (2d ed.; 2006), p. 13.
of both stare decisis\textsuperscript{21} and a Westminster model of parliamentary sovereignty.\textsuperscript{22} A prime-facie regulatory answer may be applicable to jurisdictions with a supreme-law constitution such as the United States and Germany, where superior courts such as the United States Supreme Court and the German Bundesverfassungsgericht\textsuperscript{23} are able to regulate on constitutional grounds, and have immense power over, and stemming from, their constitution.\textsuperscript{24} Such courts regulate by blocking, critiquing and, in certain instances, creating new substantive laws of the state; promulgating orders and striking down laws and on an “is or is not constitutional” test. New Zealand courts do not directly ask what “is or is not” constitutional, and do not classically regulate from that perspective. New Zealand courts lack the direct power to do so by reason of the country’s constitutional foundations. Regulatory power is inherently exercised by a court through its constitutionalism\textsuperscript{25} its place in society and its system of adjudication of rights and obligations. The Supreme Court of New Zealand (and Privy Council/Court of Appeal before 2003) sits at the apex of appellate constitutional regulation vis-à-vis rights, state and citizen. Even without supreme law constitutionalism, New Zealand outcomes in relation to court adjudicated constitutional matters are not so distinct from the United States Supreme Court, and any exploration of New Zealand courts regulatory mechanism merits attention from a comparative perspective.

Ostensibly the predominate and classical regulatory powers are the executive and legislative branches of government. Conceptually, when regulation works, individuals and firms are induced to outcomes, which in the absence of the regulatory instrument they would not have attained, or attained as quickly or to such a degree.\textsuperscript{26} This is both a regulatory function and aim of those branches. Yet, as confirmed by Ogus, an oft overlooked and underlying regulatory branch is the judiciary.\textsuperscript{27} In as much as Ogus confirms the courts are an overlooked regulatory branch, meriting further scholarship, it is here contended that courts, whether appellate or first-instance,\textsuperscript{28} whilst traditionally considered as adjudicators \textsuperscript{21} Judges created the common law; however, the concept of regulation does not fit entirely with \textit{stare decisis} because few regulators are bound by a strict system of precedent. Non-court regulation is unlikely to be cumulative in the strict precedential sense - more in line with \textit{jurisprudence constant}. There is regulation that is made and applied consistently but can be changed. Of common law regulation and common law decision making, Justice McHugh remarked in \textit{Perre v Apand Pty Ltd} [1999] HCA 36, 198 CLR 180 “[T]hat is the way of the common law, the judges preferring to go ‘from case to case, like the ancient Mediterranean mariners, hugging the coast from point to point, and avoiding the dangers of the open sea of system or science’”. The phrase was originally coined by Lord Wright, “The Study of Law”, \textit{Law Quarterly Review}, LIV (1938), p. 186.

\textsuperscript{22} After the United Kingdom acceptance of the European Court of Human Rights, it would be technically incorrect to compare New Zealand and the United Kingdom jurisdictions as both operating along the lines of parliamentary supremacy, although they both are based on the Westminster system. See Walter Bagehot, \textit{The English Constitution} (1867), pp. 187 and 212.

\textsuperscript{23} The Federal Constitutional Court of Germany (BVerfG).

\textsuperscript{24} Ogus, “Comparing Regulatory Systems: Institutions, Processes and Legal Forms in Industrialized Countries”, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 138.

\textsuperscript{25} Constitutionalism is adherence to a system of constitutional government – this image, and the extent of its adherence, will be returned to below in relation to New Zealand’s constitutional norms and the function/role of the court; that is, its constitutionalism.

\textsuperscript{26} Ogus, note 24 above, p. 135.

\textsuperscript{27} Ibid., p. 135.

\textsuperscript{28} Technically, the \textit{res} is different at first instance than on appeal, unless the appeal is heard under the \textit{de novo} exception as the judgment reads \textit{Valerie Morse v The Police} [2011] NZSC 45, even if the \textit{de novo} rule was not actually applied in that case. This article considers the wider issue of the dispute as opposed to the specific appeal pleadings and leaves the issue of the distinction between judicial regulators at first instances versus appeal courts to another article.
of disputes inter se also fulfill a general constitutional function of regulating both societal conduct and the conduct of governments. This is over and above the delineated economic actions to which Ogus refers. An underlying intent for the court as part of its constitutional regulatory function is to achieve an aggregate social best result in constitutional matters, far broader than resolving a particular lis between Person A v Person B, or Citizen v State. Second; the judiciary, as a branch of government and society, regulates via self-imposed and self-regulated discretion in a manner discrete from archetypal regulatory bodies, which makes them a particularly powerful regulatory mechanism and one worthy of due recognition and exploration.

STRUCTURE OF THIS EXPOSITION

This article, in four parts, outlines the fiat that “courts regulate” to further a nascent exposition of the judiciary as a regulatory mechanism and to provoke further discussion in the subject area; what is this regulatory mechanism that courts possess? Four illustrations are presented of judicial regulatory conduct, lis of distinction far beyond the broad traditional brocade of common law theory that judges “make law”. In other words “judges have much scope for agency in their decision making”. This article is in part a political science-based challenge (in that it recognizes the political nature of law), to the legal scholarship model that “tends to examine the quality of legal reasoning, focusing on whether a court reached the correct decision or whether its opinion provides legal certainty”, and a regulatory analysis of public law and adjudicative theories. This “new” regulatory theory is necessarily multidisciplinary in nature.

CONSTITUTIONAL NORMS

Courts and judiciary often act as national risk and right allocation-systems, either apportioning risks individually between Person A v B, Citizen v State, or in certain constitutional cases regulating outside the lis and realigning rights and risks between the State v All Citizens. Allocating risk(s) and reward(s) is a foundational regulatory function and the courts must do so with due respect to the norms of the constitutional system.

29 Ayres and Braithwaite, note 17 above, p. 56: The authors describe classical enforcement regulatory agencies. New Zealand examples would include the Commerce Commission, Financial Markets Authority, and the Takeovers Board.
30 Of the brocade, Glanville Williams, note 18 above, p. 24, suggests that “Occasionally, however, the invocation of the common law refers not to previously existing law but to the power of the judges to create law under the guise of interpreting it”; Aharon Barak, The Judge in a Democracy (2009), p. 155, Chapter 6 discusses the development of the common law and the idea of the common law as judge made law. This can be contrasted against the common law “myth” of judges discovering the law. See also; Frédéric Gilles Sourgens, A Nascent Common Law (2014) p. 28; and Jeffery Goldsworthy, “The Myth of the Common Law Constitution”, in Douglas E. Edlin (ed.), Common Law Theory (2007), p. 204; Jeffrey A. Segal and Harold J. Spaeth, The Supreme Court and the Attitudinal Model Revisited (2002).
31 Ronda L. Evans and Sean Fern, “From Applications to Appeals: A Political Science Perspective on the New Zealand Supreme Court’s Dockets”, in Mary-Rose Russell and Matthew Barber (ed.), The Supreme Court of New Zealand: 2004-2013 (2015), p. 35.
32 Ibid., p. 35.
33 Ogus, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 24.
34 Karen Yeung, “Government by Publicity Management: Sunlight or Spin? Regulatory Instruments and Techniques - Publicising Compliance Performance (“Exclamation and Excoriation”)”, in Morgan and Yeung,
The judicial mechanism sews this function in large swathes via constitutional adjudication. A citizen may take a lis against the State which leads to a change in the interaction/rights/obligations between all citizens and the State – leading to an outcome outside of the lis inter se. The national risk system analysis takes into account the cultural and constitutional context of the regime because the court regulation mechanism is both a product of, and regulator of, the regime. Morgan and Yeung adopt the approach of regulation being inherent in, and brought to the forefront by, “political and constitutional context … the social structures and institutions that allocate power”. The courts are a deus ex machina in a non-theatrical sense; they are from and for the constitution and exist to apportion resolutions to constitutional and rights problems. However the judicial regulatory mechanism is not infallible because the courts are not “cure all” corrective devices – courts regulate some of the time and regulate well even less. Not all law is regulation, especially in this regulatory analysis of public and adjudicative legal theories.

DEFINE “CONSTITUTIONAL NORM”?

A comparison, and evaluation of scope and/or effectiveness can be drawn between two “national risk systems” (jurisdictions). The ways in which each jurisdiction regulates conduct via the courts will differ due to the constitutional basis, or norms, of the system. A comparison will be superficial if “no account is taken of the cultural and constitutional context in which the regime is to be found”. A basic norm is a rule, principle or socio-legal context that underlies the foundation of the legal system. The term is used here more liberally than Kelsen in so far as there are norms within the New Zealand constitutional framework and society, which, when brought together, form the “norms” of the New Zealand legal system – a single or superior grundnorm is not subscribed to here. As discussed below, it is an entirely subjective viewpoint whether Parliamentary Sovereignty is a New Zealand grundnorm, or whether Parliamentary Sovereignty is absolute or ostensive. In a rhetorical sense, the various substantive constitutional norms, inter alia; a free and independent judiciary and the Bill of Rights Act 1990, et al., are those without which New Zealand would have no system, or a wholly different system. The judicial mechanism is both a norm, and creature of the norms – this is key to understanding the exposition.

Judicial adjudication “… may depend not only on the merits of the applicants and the use of highly detailed legislative or administrative criteria …”, but also on the basis of the system, the aforementioned “substantive constitutional norms” that exist alongside

---

35 Ogus, note 24 above, p. 135.
38 Ibid., p. 10.
39 Ogus, note 24 above, p. 135.
40 Ibid., p. 135.

JCL 12:1 113
other significant considerations. The “cultural variables of the system” or “national peculiarities”, as Hancher and Moran explain, inform both regulation and the regulatory system, as fundamentally, “place matters”. Regulation, and the court mechanism, is therefore the reason for, and a product of the court system, the court itself, why the court system was created, and the underlying social norms, the “national peculiarities”, in the context of society, and has informed its past historical development. In terms of creating a basis for a court regulatory mechanism, it is primarily found in the jurisdiction’s constitution writ large, written or unwritten. If a court system is “simply an instrument facilitating government control of the economy” versus a system “enshrine[ing] a general principle of freedom of economic activity”, then the way in which the mechanism deals with decidedly non-economic questions, regulating questions and outcomes “rights based” in nature will generally follow similar lines. All instances of adjudication are informed by the peculiarities of the place and historical development of the adjudication system.

The judicial regulator’s role is “… enforcing rights to property, to exchanges of property, and of policing the simple and complex exchange processes among competing free men”. This is part of the Hobbesian tradition, which informs constitutional norms, whereby a court system is required to regulate the market to avoid chaos. The court system in the regulatory context is best viewed as a market, and on an extended Hobbesian view regulating both commercial and other more “human”, rights. Of importance is that this “market” is contextual, and exists influenced by societal norms.

FROM GREAT CONSTITUTIONAL CONSTRAINT COMES GREAT REGULATORY POWER

The executive and the legislature are constrained by the constitution; it is from this constraint that the judiciary gains regulatory force. By enforcing constitutional constraints against expanding intrusive regulation into citizens’ rights, emanating from the government/legislative/executive (be it economic or social regulation), the judicial branch is itself creating regulation by upholding, altering, or furthering social, or rights based, norms. From the United States perspective “… this will depend on the set of politico-economic values to which that [constitutional] document gives expression…”. By contrast, the New

---

42 Ogus, note 24 above, p. 135.
43 Hancher and Moran, “Organizing regulatory space”, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 65.
44 Ibid., p. 65.
46 Thomas Hobbes, Leviathan: Or, The Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth Ecclesiastical and Civil (4th ed.; 1894), p. 197: “… any by this means destroying all laws, both divine and human, reduce all order, government, and society to the first chaos of violence and civil war”. 47 Regulatory force within the judicial branch is, within a common law society, also inherent. For example the writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, which in New Zealand exists and preexists the constraint on the Executive via the Habeas Corpus Act 2001. In s 5(a) the first purpose of the Act is stated as “to reaffirm the historic and constitutional purpose of the writ of habeas corpus as a vital means of safeguarding individual liberty:”, the fourth purpose of the Act is to “(d) abolish writs of habeas corpus other than the writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum”.
48 Regulation is defined below.
49 Ogus, note 24 above, p. 136.
Zealand constitution is unwritten and our courts must take an “open textured approach” to constitutional matters.\textsuperscript{50}

The parameters of New Zealand Constitution are undefined; at its core, interpretation rests on socio-legal context and on a malleable set of documents and contextual analysis, for example the Judicature Act 1908 and the Treaty of Waitangi (signed in 1840 between the Crown and Māori). This is a type of administrative regulation via “methods of statutory interpretation that seek to protect underrepresented interests or that force[s] explicit deliberation and disclosure”\textsuperscript{51} in an extended sense. In essence it requires both an open conversation of what is the constitution and what is in the constitution and which parts are applicable to the regulatory endeavor. This is in contrast to the style of written regulation, as found in the Commerce Act 1986 and promulgated by its Commission, which tends to have a high level of precision in order to protect against writ-large judicial interpretation and is therefore formulated in very specific terms.\textsuperscript{52} New Zealand courts “continue to uphold the principle of comity [with Parliament] while acknowledging the necessity for judicial sovereignty [in BORA matters]”.\textsuperscript{53} The very point of our “open textured” approach is to provide for the undefined parameters; this does not mean it is any less precise on application – or not regulatory. It is a discernibly different methodology formulated due to the context of New Zealand norms and the context of the self-demarcated Constitutional Regulator: the Judiciary.

The Judiciary, as Regulator, acts as a dual functionary: as a regulatory implementer and a regulatory designer.\textsuperscript{54} Uniquely, the Regulator (judiciary) adopted, formulated, and implemented the “open-textured” approach.\textsuperscript{55} The regulatory power in the New Zealand judicial mechanism emanates from the open textured constitution which necessitated a similar approach be taken towards a fundamental constitutional norm, the Bill of Rights Act. This gives a flavor of a different style of power, admittedly less awe-inspiring, and more indirect than the judiciary in countries with an entrenched and/or supreme constitution. The judiciaries’ power is less self-effacing. The result is that in New Zealand there is scope for inclusion or exclusion of constitutional norms. Therefore the ultimate composition(s) of the constitution by the judiciary in a \textit{lis} of distinction, case of constitutional importance, is formulated by both an “open textured” approach to BORA, and the constitution itself, as the approach and the judicial mechanism is part of the constitution. The United States Supreme Court has supreme-law power, exercised conspicuously by annulling legislation,\textsuperscript{56} far in excess of New Zealand’s superior courts. However, arguably New Zealand courts have greater interpretive scope, for example interpreting the ability of citizens to carry firearms in the context of the twenty-first-century. Such rights, not being enshrined in \textsuperscript{50} The phrase possibly was first coined by Paul Rishworth, “Human Rights - from the Top”, \textit{Modern Law Review}, LX (1997), p. 171; See also Mark Henaghan, “The Changes to Final Appeals in New Zealand Since the Creation of the New Zealand Supreme Court”, \textit{Otago Law Review}, XII (2011), p. 579, where the author uses the phrase an umpteen number of times. “Open textured” is now part of the New Zealand legal lexicon.

\textsuperscript{51} Stephen Croley, “Theories of Regulation: Incorporating the Administrative Process” (1998), in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 46.

\textsuperscript{52} Ogus, note 24 above, p. 139.

\textsuperscript{53} Petra Butler, “Bill of Rights”, in Russell and Barber, note 31 above, p. 256.

\textsuperscript{54} Hancher and Moran, note 43 above, pp. 62 and 66; Tony Prosser, “Nationalised Industries and Public Control”, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 40.

\textsuperscript{55} See Rishworth, note 50 above; Henaghan, note 50 above.

\textsuperscript{56} Ogus, note 24 above, p. 138: Ogus comments that there is a persuasive case for the Indian judiciary to be crowned most active.
Common Law Courts

a document, are therefore limited in interpretive scope.\textsuperscript{57} Therein lies an element of the New Zealand judicial mechanism: greater interpretive discretion weighted against less power. This regulatory “imprecision is consistent with the natural desires of judges to leave themselves … flexibility in future cases”.\textsuperscript{58} New Zealand, as one of only three countries in the world with an unwritten constitution,\textsuperscript{59} cannot be accused of inadequate constitutional legislative provision, but congratulated for successful constitutional regulation by the courts. The unwritten and open textured approach to our constitution, imprecise in nature, and possibly wide in scope, is a conscious choice by all branches of government. Codification and proclamation could be undertaken most easily via common law dicta. This was done by Cooke P, in enumerating the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi,\textsuperscript{60} in the \textit{Lands Case}, itself an exercise of the judicial regulatory mechanism. Codification writ large is not the norm in New Zealand due to the appreciation of contextualization in New Zealand constitutionalism. A cynic might argue that there was no appreciation of contextualization in situations like s9 of the State Owned Enterprise Act 1986,\textsuperscript{61} which triggered the \textit{Lands Case}. Rather, Parliament was paying lip service to the Treaty of Waitangi without actually intending for the courts to give it substantive legal expression, by mentioning “principles” which had never been enunciated, or did not exist. Yet it was the judiciary who decided, in New Zealand’s constitutional dialogue, that it was Parliament’s intent for the courts to adjudicate that \textit{lis} (on constitutional grounds as opposed to a purely limited \textit{inter se} adjudication); in New Zealand constitutional dialogue Parliament’s intent is for the courts to the decide. Nevertheless the court, acting as regulatory implementer and designer, is highly efficient in responding to changing circumstances, and New Zealand is fortunate to be afforded such bespoke tailoring. Indeed the Constitutional Advisory Panel key recommendation to the Government was to “actively support a continuing conversation about the constitution”,\textsuperscript{62} and in essence to further develop the contextual and open textured nature of the New Zealand unwritten text.

New Zealanders are not constitutional documentary fundamentalists.\textsuperscript{63} On this premise its courts are less encumbered than United States counterparts as New Zealand \textsuperscript{57} The Second Amendment to the United States Constitution is codified and “…the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed”, whereas the United States Supreme Court can strike down offending legislation as “unconstitutional” and one of its major regulatory roles is to interpret the constitution it is bounded in by the documentary fundamentalism inherent in the text.

\textsuperscript{59} The United Kingdom and Israel being the other two. the term “lacking” is not used. It should be noted however that the United Kingdom, by triggering Article 50 and discussions of a “British Bill of Rights”, will likely move in the direction of further constitutional debate, statutory clarification, and regulation to fill the vacuum, so much so that it will likely not fit into the same category as Israel and New Zealand.

\textsuperscript{60} \textit{New Zealand Māori Council v Attorney-General (the Lands Case)} [1987] 1 NZLR 641.

\textsuperscript{61} Section 9 provided that the courts must take into account “the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi”.

\textsuperscript{62} Constitutional Advisory Panel \textit{New Zealand’s Constitution: A Report on a Conversation} (2013), p. 9; The report was commissioned by the Hon. Bill English and Hon. Dr Pita Sharples, Ministers for Constitutional Affairs. The co-chairs of the report were Emeritus Professor John Burrows QC and Sir Tipene O’Regan (Ngāi Tahu).

\textsuperscript{63} In so far as certain rights exist, such as the right to keep and bear arms, because the context at the time the document was written necessitated it; See Morton Horwitz, “Foreword: The Constitution of Change: Legal Fundamentality without Fundamentalism”, \textit{Harvard Law Review}, XXXII (1993), p. 107; See also Dennis J. Goldford, \textit{The American Constitution and the Debate Over Originalism} (2005), p. 76.
lacks a restrictive document and is free to fetter ethereal restraints.64 This is enshrined in ss 4 and 5 of the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 (“BORA”) which provides that other legislative enactments are not affected by the rights contained in the Act and that parliament may place limitations – limitations are justified in a free and democratic society - on rights and freedoms.65 Our open textured approach exists in the ebb and flow of s 6 where an interpretation consistent with BORA (and its rights and freedoms) is to be preferred if possible. The judicial mechanism can be hampered by lack of documentary force majeure, for it has no supreme-law constitution to fall back on, but strengthened by the open interpretive scope of its rights regulatory framework.66 This is a perplexing balance for which ultimately New Zealand’s highest court will regulate. Lord Cooke, on the establishment of the Supreme Court noted the “academic (perhaps) question of collision under section 3(2) of the Supreme Court Act 2003”, that “Nothing in this Act affects New Zealand’s continuing commitment to the rule of the and the sovereignty of Parliament”, finding that those two concepts could conceivably clash.67

THE NEW ZEALAND BILL OF RIGHTS ACT 1990 - A FUNDAMENTAL NORM

The courts have always been required to perform a gap-filling role of pronouncement of applicability and enforcement,68 and indeed to self-populate New Zealand’s rights mechanism. The government enacted and enshrined selected preexisting common law rights into statute law69 without a private-enforcement mechanism in the statute. Minister Palmer,70 when formulating the policy behind BORA, did not specify an enforcement mechanism for the rights contained in the Act nor any quantum(s) of damages, should they even be available. This came later when the court regulated executive conduct/abuses in Baigents Case.71 The private enforcement mechanism of the various rights contained in BORA arose due to the inability of Parliament at the time to enact a supreme-law Bill of 64 This article does not focused on the Canadian Charter of Rights, on which the New Zealand BORA was modeled. The Canadian Charter is supreme and highly flexible; see Carter v Canada 2015 SCC 5; See also the quotation at the start of this article: Barak, note 1 above, p. 449.

65 It is not the purpose of this article to discuss the interplay of rights limitations in BORA, for example whether one subscribes to the Moomen v Film and Literature Board of Review [2000] 2 NZLR 9 (CA) or the R v Hansen [2007] 3 NZLR 1 (NZSC) test; See Andrew S. Butler, “Limiting Rights”, in Carter and Palmer (ed.), Essays in Honour of Sir Ivor Richardson (2002), p. 113; See also Claudia Geiringer and Steven Price, “Moving from Self-Justification to Demonstrable Justification”, in Jeremy Finn and Stephen Todd (ed.), Law, Liberty, Legislation (2008), p. 295.
66 See the Interpretations Act 1999, s 5: where “The meaning of an enactment must be ascertained form its text and in the light of its purpose”; this is a version of the golden rule/thread running through most judicial interpretation statutes.
69 See Bill of Rights Act 1990, s 28, for express recognition of the other forgotten pre-existing common law rights existing outside of the Act.
70 Currently the Rt. Hon. Sir Geoffrey Palmer, QC, AO, KCMG; former Minister of Justice; Attorney-General; Prime Minister; Law Commissioner; current Distinguished Fellow, Faculty of Law, Victoria University of Wellington; Global Affiliated Professor, The University of Iowa College of Law.
Common Law Courts

Rights. Government policy was ineffective to protect and regulate rights and courts now regulate these rights, their holders — the citizens, and infringers — the State.

Courts are surgical in their rights intervention. Not only does a “right exist” or is a “right breached” (either by act or omission), but policy intervention is formulated in the form of remedy awarded. BORA remedies are discretionary and do not exist as a right once a breach is established. Our courts act by implication with their regulatory policy directives: allowing monetary damages, the threat of future damages or a declaration speak for itself. The court may not direct legislative conduct, although it can declare a breach and notionally penalize it – via a declaration (a stern admonition) or “Baigents” damages. The position is deserving of some criticism as the court cannot prohibit, in the form of an order (mandamus), the executive or legislative action from occurring again, in so far as striking down the offending statute. This is because the court has no control over the legislature, and the executive is often acting pursuant to legislature enablement/Acts of Parliament. Only the threat of future judicial condemnation exists to stop the legislature trampling rights, or pragmatically in the New Zealand executive dominated legislature – judicial condemnation of the government of the day, which usually holds both executive and legislative majority. This may appear “soft” regulation, but is more forceful when considering that BORA contained no remedy provisions whatsoever from the Acts outset. Both Baigents damages and declarations are creatures of the courts’ design and implementation mechanisms created by the court within the bounds of New Zealand’s constitutional arraignment. Parliament, although yet to be tested, is ostensibly sovereign.

The judiciary regulates conduct. When adjudicating fundamental rights, their regulatory reach can have aggregate effect on all rights in the State (the market of citizens) not just in the lis before the court. “Law structures conversations about regulation”, but also allows for its implementation writ large. This mechanism allows an analysis of issues in a way that would be “impossible when we dismiss out of hand the entire judicial regulatory enterprise as illegitimate judicial activism”. Courts do more than simply adjudicating disputes inter se, and, when they do so, it is not necessarily to be dismissed as illegitimate activism. That said, concerns regarding courts as regulators do not “dispose of the concerns of legitimacy and efficacy that attend judicial policymaking”. One can say with confidence that the ability for the judiciary to regulate in the field of rights, and the public’s acceptance of this, is part of the legitimate function of the common law. In New Zealand this stems perhaps not from BORA in the 1990s, or primarily from common law

73 Bill of Rights Act, s 3: limits the applicability of the rights to acts done by either of the three branches of government or those exercising a public function, power or duty by or pursuant to law.
75 As specifically stated in the Supreme Court Act 2003, s 3(2). Although Lord Cooke of Thorndon, “The Road Ahead for the Common Law”, International and Comparative Law Quarterly, LIV (2004), p. 278, is of the view that “the supremacism of either [the Court or Parliament] has no place”.
76 Morgan and Yeung, “Regulation Above and Beyond the State: Legitimation”, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 323 at 6.4.1.
77 Luff, note 68 above, p. 326.
78 Morgan and Yeung, note 76 above, p. 331 at 6.5.2.
79 Luff, note 68 above, p. 326.
80 S. Breyer, “Regulation and its Reform: Changes in Liability Rules”, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 90: Breyer describes this in regulatory terminology as the non-economic or moral factors in the common law in the context of the difficulty of always achieving an efficient economic ends in liability rules.
principles immemorial, but in part due appreciation in both the public and legal fields of statements from Sir Robin Cooke, a judicial talisman in New Zealand rights discourse who has left his mark on many a constitutional norm. Sir Robin is not the jurisdictional authority whom New Zealand courts rely on to allow them to regulate rights, but he is a guiding influence in this area and provides judicial direction to his brethren as to how far the New Zealand bench could go in the field of rights regulation – stemming from the common law – and now BORA.

ALL THAT BEING SAID AND DONE, WHAT THEN IS REGULATION?

The greatest difficulty is to classify “regulation” within a legal system. Even Morgan and Yeung admit that, from a legal perspective, regulation is “notoriously difficult to define with clarity and precision”. At one end, regulation is not entirely black letter law; at the other end it is discernable that the Takeovers Code is regulation. The widest perspective is that all common law is a form of regulation, especially when common law is used as or effects social control/order and has coercive power. But not all air is breathable, and not all law is regulation or regulatory in nature. The exact formula is a paradigm one might not successfully resolve here, and nor is it suggested that an attempt to define and demarcate “regulatory law” is a fruitful exercise. The focus is on “Rights law” as inherently upheld and protected by the courts as a discrete form of judicial common law regulation.

A definition of regulation is an almost ethereal phrase. Regulation is “a rule prescribed for the management of some matter, or for the regulating of conduct; governing precept or direction; a standing rule”. Furthermore although it is not every rule, as defined by Hood and others, regulation exists due to its “… capacity for standard-setting, to allow a distinction to be made between more or less preferred states of the system … there must be some capacity for behavior-modification to change the state of the system”. Rights law and constitutional norms fit comfortably within the Hood definition. Logically, “what is the system?” is addressed in this article in terms of either the courts and judiciary or their underlying constitutional function, both adjudicators and rights protectors. This class is focused on as an under recognized entity which legitimately modifies aggregate behavior via the lis before them.

---

81 Developing from the Norman conquests or perhaps since recorded in the volumes of the Selden Society.
82 Robin Cooke, Baron Cooke of Thorndon. New Zealand’s only judge to have sat in the House of Lords and one of New Zealand’s most influential jurists.
83 Ogus, note 24 above, p. 138.
84 Morgan and Yeung, note 36 above, p. 3.
86 Morgan and Yeung, note 36 above, p. 4.
88 The easiest way for a black letter lawyer to describe or “point to” regulation is “legislative instruments” as defined by s 4 Legislation Act 2012. Although to answer for the purposes of this article that delegated legislation are regulations is a very narrow scope indeed; for further discussion see Carter, Carter, McHerron and Malone, Subordinate Legislation in New Zealand (2013).
Courts and the judiciary are unique regulators. When a citizen takes action in court against the State to enforce a fundamental right, or a tortious or contractual right, the court regulates that right; either in its existence, its enforcement, or the degree of its utility to the citizen and inconvenience for the State in remedy awarded, financial or otherwise.91 There will always be one party better off and one party worse off when the lis involves any sort of right. This is especially so when the right is fundamental because such rights are termed “core” and “inalienable” and “human” for reasons that they are intrinsic to our very sense of self. In this relationship between citizens and State the court sits betwixt implementing and designing. The judiciary are not role-playing “actors” or mere functionaries – civil servant bureaucrats – who exist to give effect to the system, rather, the judicial mechanism exists because of the right to justice.92 It is sui generis with nothing else. Such a right is the regulation of conduct between citizen and State, in and of itself, and is informed by the constitutional structure. This is why judicial regulators exist with a judicial mechanism as opposed to a “judicial or arbitrator functionary”. This is an important distinction; the latter is to merely adjudicate disputes with no recognition of the wider effect of the lis or its contextual constitutional function and is comparable to various small claims or limited disputes tribunals who only affect the parties before them. In this regulatory thesis the judiciary and courts are part of, and can change, the system (norm). On the other hand, a judicial functionary or arbitrator cannot change the system and only serves to enforce it in a limited sense as even in enforcing the system it is limited in developing it. Dispute referees in tribunals have limited jurisdiction and do not set a precedent even among other tribunals in the same hierarchy.93

A criticism is that higher rights-based principles are more relevant in judicial decision-making and that economic rationality is not the prevalent value in legal decision-making.94 Such a view overlooks the distinction that a quasi-market for “rights” also exists within the regulatory sphere due to the laws threat and umpire regulatory contributions. Law engages with a variety of roles in the regulatory endeavor:95

At the level of national regulation, both the law’s facilitative and expressive dimension are reflected in its related but distinct contributions to regulation, encapsulated by two images: the law as a threat and the law as an umpire.

A market for rights is not the same as economic rationality. Enforcement of, or a lis for, a right may be contrary to the rational act or principle.96 This does not preclude that there is both a limited supply of rights and unlimited demand for them,97 and that there exists

---

91 Such incursion can be into settled substantive law and legal doctrine which may require Government departments to alter their policies. Or as the New Zealand Parliament is supreme, court intrusion may result in subsequent corrective legislative action.

92 The right to justice is both a fundamental common law right, which both underpins the system, exists in and is part of our open-textured constitution and is enshrined in statute in s 27 of the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990.

93 Disputes Tribunal Act 1988, s 10 subject to the Limitation Act 2010; Motor Vehicle Sales Act 2003, s 21.

95 Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 339.

96 That individuals maximize their economic utility in every decision they make, they would not for example sue someone for the “principle of the matter”.

97 The right (or ability) for refugee seekers to live in New Zealand is currently limited to 750 (+- 10%), due to the conflict in Syria New Zealand will accept a special emergency intake of 600 additional (Syrian) refugees in addition to the quota: Department of Immigration “New Zealand Refugee Quota” (accessed 7 March 2017)
a market. While all people inherently possess the same (human/fundamental) rights as others, people are not born into substantive equality. A market approach to rights realizes that recognition of inherent rights is often a distributive role of the State which has limited resources. An incorrect definition of a “market” is that there must be a willing buyer and a willing seller; that is a theoretical definition of pure laissez-faire capitalism. A market is simply a system of exchange.98 Part of the courts’ role is inherently distributive in ensuring equilibrium rights distribution between citizen and State. Rules against vexatious litigants protect citizens and the State against those who may have a claim for a right/obligation but who do so for motives which the court considers impure.99 The demand for rights increases, for example the right to “life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness”, is becoming rarer and is not granted easily to non-citizens or those from outside the regulated area.100 The role of the judiciary, as a regulatory mechanism and part of the foundational norms, then becomes ever more important in modifying behavior to change the state of the system.101

PROTECTING THE SUSPECT CLASSES –
REGULATING VIA A LIS OF DISTINCTION

The reality “of the separation of powers remains problematic in New Zealand, with a small unicameral legislature still largely dominated by the executive in ways that are even more extreme than executive domination of Parliament in the UK”.102 It is no accident that “inherent in the act [and role] of judging, the role of law may be the result of contextual factors”103 and a recognition that “… judges have much scope for agency in their decision making” to protect rights.104 The classic criticism of judicial regulation is that: “the power of judges to decide important questions of public policy seems to run counter to the democratic ideal that reserves such decisions to democratically elected representatives”105 and that such judicial power illegitimately extends beyond adjudicating the lis before them into wider constitutional matters.106 This concern is built on a foundation of misunderstanding. From the perspective of a Commonwealth lawyer107 the powers of the Supreme Court of the United States of America seem arcane and foreign. That court routinely makes 98 Scott, “Regulation in the Age of Governance: The Rise of the Post-Regulatory State”, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 130; See also Morgan and Yeung, note 36 above, p. 5. And although the authors overcomplicate the system of exchange principle, their inherent recognition of it is clear.

99 Judicature Act 1908, s 88B; see The Attorney-General v Vincent Ross Siemer [2014] NZHC 859, where Mr. Siemer was declared a vexatious litigant after Mr. Siemer took nineteen proceedings, of which the court found fifteen vexatious.
100 See the numerous reports of Syrian refugees attempting to cross the Mediterranean for asylum in Europe and the differing responses of European Union countries. In 2015 the world view was that of prosperous Germany allowing free entry and providing “rights” such as housing, and others such as Hungary building a wall to keep refugees away from accessing European Union mandated aid: Anne Bernard and Karam Shoumal, “Image of Drowned Syrian, Aylan Kurdi, 3, Brings Migrant Crisis Into Focus”, New York Times (4 September 2015), p. A1.
101 Hood, note 90 above, p. 23.
102 Jeremy Waldron, “Foreword”, to Russell and Barber, note 31 above, p. viii.
103 Evans and Fern, note 31 above, p. 57.
104 Ibid., p. 35.
105 Norman Redlich, “Judges as Instruments of Democracy”, in Shetreet, note 1 above, p. 149.
106 Ibid.
107 Subscribing to the United Kingdom Commonwealth of laws as opposed to the United States Commonwealth.
important decisions of public policy that would often be left to a democratically elected parliament within Commonwealth jurisdictions. The United States perception of the judiciary is different from their New Zealand counterparts; primarily because in various states of the Union the bench has political appointments and elections. However, on the federal circuit there is a comparable judicial oath with New Zealand; to uphold the Constitution and laws (of the United States), and the United States Supreme Court is the symbolic tertiary-level classical regulator. Evens and Fern underscore this comparison, writing that:

> the Supreme Court of Canada is charged with granting leave to cases that raise questions of “public importance” and the SCOTUS [Supreme Court of the United States] is supposed to grant certiorari… to cases that involve “important federal matters… [And] these criteria do not differ greatly from those that apply to the Supreme Court in New Zealand …

A recent analysis of the New Zealand Supreme Court found that in public law/rights cases the court was prepared to both cite and use decisions of other jurisdictions, the most prevalent being the United States. The United States Supreme Court merits comparative analysis as a touchstone with the New Zealand system even though respective perceptions (political versus apolitical) are different. Furthermore, Evans and Fern conclude that North American theories of judicial decision making give the most persuasive account of how the New Zealand Supreme Court selects appeals for review. However, the allegation of “governance by the judiciary” could hardly ever be levied in New Zealand. Some may point to the potential for such an occurrence stemming from Cooke P’s hallowed dicta in Taylor v New Zealand Poultry.

108 Redlich, note 105 above, p. 149; The recent United States Supreme Court decision on gay marriage Obergefell v Hodges 576 U.S. 14-556 (2015), is a prime example.

109 Judicial Oath 28 U. S. C. § 453: “I, ________, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon me as ________ under the Constitution and laws of the United States. So help me God”.

111 Evans and Fern, note 31 above, pp. 35, 55; See texts such as Jason L. Pierce, Inside the Mason Court Revolution (2006), p. 221.
Ronald Dworkin advanced the theory that the judiciary has the role to further morality in the law; this was his “fusion of constitution law and moral theory”. Alexsis de Tocqueville’s classic political theory concluded that, “political questions in American politics are ultimately framed as judicial ones”. If both mould together, it appears that the judiciary are either the moral visionaries or provide the moral equilibrium of society. I do not propose to debate Professors Raz and Waldron on inter-authority relationships and which branch should be deferential to whom, in either having or exercising morals, or which of courts versus Parliament are justified in their respective authority and why. These are valid concerns for another article. It is sufficient to proceed on the premise that a legitimate function of the courts is to regulate so as to protect those, who, in the words of Justice Stone in Carolene Products, are members of the “suspect classes”. It is the courts in most democracies who have taken priority in protecting rights, and, as Shapiro concludes, citizens often seek out the courts to protect or achieve their own “political morality” when the majoritarian and utilitarian nature of democracy goes the opposing way.

Often minority groups are disrespected, marginalized, by the democratic process or not afforded fair hearing rights. Many theories are seemingly premised on the basis that government and laws represent the majority and the judiciary acts in certain cases to overturn the majority position for “moral” reasons, to protect the “suspect classes” and they are therefore counter-majoritarian. In this vein Justice Kennedy of the United States Supreme Court writing for the majority in the marriage-equality case Obergefell v. Hodges held: 125

The dynamic of our constitutional system is that individuals need not await legislative action before asserting a fundamental right. The Nation’s courts are open to injured individuals who come to them to vindicate their own direct, personal stake in our basic charter. An individual can invoke a right to constitutional protection when he or she is harmed, even if the broader public disagrees and even if the legislature refuses to act.

It is unlikely that such forceful sentiment would be issued from the New Zealand Supreme Court 126 even on questions of democracy and fundamental rights. Not least because of fundamentally different “charters”, but due to the underlying “dynamic” of the New Zealand constitutional system. Indeed in Quilter v Attorney-General 127 the Court of Appeal, then the highest domestic appeals court, specifically left the matter of the definition of “marriage”, “man and woman” in the Marriage Act 1956, to Parliament. As Joseph explained: “This decision checked the potential of s 6 to revisit established statutory meanings … the Court would not rewrite the legislation under guise of applying the Bill of Rights”, 128 this was even though the court had interpretative scope under BORA to do so. It took until 2013 for parliament to extend the definition. 129 The New Zealand constitutional charter is unwritten and changing, but no less tangible as NZ has a constitution. Whether pointing specifically to BORA, the Electoral Act 1993 or something unwritten, individuals in New Zealand have a personal stake in the norms of the constitution and courts take a position in regulating rights and norms.

Asking then of the New Zealand constitutional dynamic three questions: (i) do individuals in New Zealand need to await legislative action before asserting a fundamental right – thus is something asserted not a “right” nor “fundamental” unless Parliament has actioned or breached it? This view of Dworkin influenced Kennedy J in Obergefell; that the evolving nature and development of constitutional rights are based on norms of political morality; that “… legal practice in Anglo-American political Culture demands the integrity of law. Integrity is a moral virtue of the law irrespective of outcomes”. 130 Dworkin’s examples revolve around rights that were never explicitly stated in the United States Constitution nor covered by legislation, such as marriage-equality. His thesis, most apparent in Laws Empire, was that the United States Supreme Court had a constitutional mandate through his “law as political morality framework”, concluding that one cannot be discriminated against on the basis of sexuality, 131 ultimately reflected in the Obergefell

---

127 Ibid., Quilter.
129 Marriage (Definition of Marriage) Amendment Act 2013. The Bill was commonly known as the “same sex marriage bill”; State approved civil unions have been legal between all sexes in New Zealand since the Civil Union Act 2004.
131 Ibid., p. 173
decision. Dworkin’s definition of popular morality was “the set of opinions about justice and other political and personal virtues that are held as matters of conviction by most members of a community”.\textsuperscript{132} This is exemplified in his ultimate conclusion that the duty of a citizen to submit to the authority of law is a moral duty.\textsuperscript{133} On this basis it must be for the courts to regulate “law as political morality”.

Applied to the New Zealand context, (ii) is the constitutional model not ostensibly of Parliamentary Supremacy? Yes, but with caveats that provide a “last resort” regulatory scope/power for the court. And therefore (iii) is the New Zealand judicial regulation of rights, the mechanism, poorer than the United States? The answer is no, for outward displays of power and forceful oral sentiments from the bench are the wrong premise for the investigation – it would not be in keeping with New Zealand norms. The constitutional dynamic differs, but the ability of the courts to protect fundamental rights is still a fundamental norm. These questions will be explored below with reference to New Zealand’s law of privacy where the court looked to the common law to give effect to privacy rights, which could be founded in common law, but were explicitly excluded from BORA by the legislature.\textsuperscript{134}

Justices Kirby and Cooke\textsuperscript{135} have shared differing opinions on this matter of parliamentary sovereignty. Neither is fallacious, and it may well be true that “… the moral significance of the ideal of the rule of law provides justification for judges to reject legislative supremacy and institute judicial supremacy”.\textsuperscript{136} It is perhaps less of a matter of scholarship than one’s own inherent corpus constitution. A third dimension is found in a long forgotten foreword by Justice Mahon, who, critically commenting on the white paper for New Zealand’s proposed Bill of Rights Bill, wrote:\textsuperscript{137}

As an alternative to the Westminster style, there is another way of controlling executive power. Leave it to the judges to consider whether an act is unlawful or invalid under a Human Rights Act, as infringing a declared human right. The rights of …[various human rights…] are too plain to require attention but they may be and have been within my memory intruded on and eroded by executive power and by uncontrolled parliamentary supremacy… I am in favour of the proposal [for a supreme law Bill of Rights]. I know exactly how the judicial system of New Zealand works. I know of no judge, neither High Court nor Appellate judge, who would knowingly violate his judicial oath by yielding to government pressure.

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{132} Ronald Dworkin, \textit{Laws Empire} (1986), p. 97, 93.
  \item \textsuperscript{133} Ibid., p. 191.
  \item \textsuperscript{134} \textit{C v Holland} [2012] NZHC 2155; \textit{Hosking v Runting & Others} [2004] NZCA 34.
  \item \textsuperscript{135} Justice Michael Kirby, “Deep Ling Rights – A Constitutional Conversation Continues” (Paper presented to The Robin Cooke Lecture 2004, Wellington, New Zealand, 25 November 2004); See also the earlier paper of Justice Michael Kirby, “Lord Cooke and Fundamental Rights” (Paper presented to the New Zealand Legal Research Foundation Conference, Auckland, New Zealand, 4-5 April 1997).
  \item \textsuperscript{136} Ekins, note 9 above, p. 127. Ekins holds the opposing view.
\end{itemize}
New Zealanders may either rest easy, knowing that the as of yet “in reserve” constraints on Parliamentary power are “theoretical” and “extrajudicial”, although they may take solace also knowing that this may not always be the case.

Perhaps the advent of the mixed-member-proportional electoral system and New Zealand’s somewhat “Bridled Power” would have tempered Mahon J’s suspicion; this is doubtful. Minister Palmer did not succeed in passing a supreme-law Bill of Rights which would allow courts to regulate rights and norms and strike offending rights inconsistent legislation down (akin to the United States Supreme Court), much to Sir Geoffrey’s lament. The thing asserted, a right, such as “to life”, predates the rights statute and emanates from either time immemorial or from the common law. The act itself did not substantively create new rights which did not already exist in some form in the common law ethos/tradition. BORA provides an accepted societal mechanism, a legislative/regulatory framework, for settling disputes over those rights; i.e. the judiciary by regulating them; by founding their substantive existence in documentary text – codified written regulations. In Mahon J’s view, such rights are best governed and adjudicated by the judiciary without a restrictive legislative/regulatory framework, and as is clear from his lived experience, are most trampled upon by executive/legislative power. The Judicial Oath specifies that the judge will serve His/Her Majesty “according to law”, and “... will do right to all manner of people after the laws and usages of New Zealand”. The law before The Bill of Rights Act, qua rights, were common law rights/freedoms; now the law is both common law rights and BORA – it is the mechanics of enforcement, the regulation, in the New Zealand environment that has changed. The “according to law and usages” of New Zealand provides now that courts regulate rights primarily through the current BORA framework. BORA is part of the regulatory framework for rights in New Zealand, and what rights may lie deeper, regarding the common law of New Zealand, is easy to discern (as not even parliament can disturb them) but difficult to action. Although fundamental rights exist outside the BORA framework, it is easier for courts to adjudicate inside BORA than out, as a regulatory framework exists. Citizens come to court, as Shapiro suggests, in order to use the framework, BORA, to affect their personal morality vested in them by the State.

---

140 Geoffrey W. R. Palmer, New Zealand’s Constitution in Crisis (1992) p. 60: Sir Geoffrey opines of its “… relatively humble status as an ordinary act”, but does conclude that even though it does not allow courts to strike down Acts it still “changes a great deal”.
141 Bill of Rights Act, s 8.
142 Immemorial or to ascribe a date; with the invasion of the Normans in 1066 ad and refined by the Plantagenet’s in 1154 ad.
143 Likely referring to one particularly long executive tenure, that of Prime Minister Sir Robert Muldoon from 1975 to 1984.
144 Oaths and Declarations Act 1957, s 18; the Judicial Oath remains substantively the same as in the Promissory Oaths Act 1908 s 4 (151).
145 Bill of Rights Act, s 28.
146 Ibid.
147 Hancher and Moran, note 43 above, p. 66.
148 Shapiro, note 122 above, p. 262.
Taylor v Attorney-General\(^{149}\) was a case of affecting personal morality. A group of citizens wished to affect their personal morality and assert a personal stake in a constitutional norm – universal suffrage. Heath J was faced with the following questions: “... whether Parliament has passed legislation to deny serving prisoners the right to vote in a manner inconsistent with the Bill of Rights, and not justifiable in a free and democratic society. [And]... whether this Court should formally declare that to be so”\(^{150}\) The framework in this lis of distinction was BORA, and it is through “the use of judicial adjudication within a regulatory framework [that] provides scope for private enforcement”\(^{151}\)

The Attorney-General found the legislation to be inconsistent with BORA and went so far as to state that “The objective of the Bill is not rationally linked to the blanket ban on voting. [As] It is questionable that every person serving a sentence of imprisonment is necessarily a serious offender”\(^{152}\) In this instance majority policy trumped trammeled minority rights.

Faced with the possibility of making the first court declaration of BORA inconsistency in New Zealand history,\(^{153}\) Heath J emphasized that for the High Court to do so would be a “solemn finding”.\(^{154}\) He referred to the framework holding that\(^{155}\)

... the Court is required to take into account quasi-political considerations, to determine whether an inconsistency is “demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society”\(^{156}\) That is not the type of analysis in which the Courts of this country could legitimately indulge before the Bill of Rights came into force. The power to do so was conferred by Parliament, when s 5 was enacted.

The courts have long questioned the power to declare statutes inconsistent.\(^{157}\) This is an example of the judicial mechanism self-regulating, as the power to declare is not explicitly provided in BORA, but through implied interpretive reference in s 4. Rishworth \(^{149}\) Taylor v Attorney-General, note 74 above.

\(^{150}\) Ibid., at [4].

\(^{151}\) K. Yeung, “Privatising Competition Regulation”, in Morgan and Yeung, note 16 above, p. 210: Although Yeung is analyzing competition law, her regulatory framework methodology is equally applicable to BORA. Her argument is that there was an absence of private enforcement rights in United Kingdom competition law, and therefore no framework – as such a framework is needed to enable judicial adjudication in a regulated area.

\(^{152}\) Christopher Finlayson, Report of the Attorney-General under the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 on the Electoral (Disqualification of Convicted Prisoners) Amendment Bill (New Zealand Government, 2010), at [16]–[18]: The effect of the ban was that a person who was imprisoned for a short sentence that happened to fall during the polling period was disenfranchised. It should be pointed out that the Attorney-General did not necessarily himself write the report; he merely need present it to parliament. Often the task is delegated to the Ministry of Justice.

\(^{153}\) Taylor v Attorney-General, note 74 above, at [36]. In R v Pounako [2000] 2 NZLR 695 (CA) Thomas J at paras [86]–[107] was of the view that “nothing less than a formal declaration will suffice to maintain the constitutional integrity of the Bill of Rights”.

\(^{154}\) Ibid., at [30].

\(^{155}\) Ibid., at [43].

\(^{156}\) Emphasizing s 5 Bill of Rights Act 1990; “subject to section 4, the rights and freedoms contained in this Bill of Rights may be subject to only such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society”, s 4 reads that no other enactments are affected and thus BORA is not supreme-law.

explored such a remedy in 1998 and suggested that “But one thing it [s 4] does not do is preclude comment and proclamation”. Rishworth concluded, and Heath J quoted adding emphasis that “…once again there is room for judicial choice as to where our Bill of Rights should be located on the spectrum of constitutional significance”. Heath J placed it high on the mantel.

A leading New Zealand specialist in public law, Geiringer, once believed “the prospects for the development of a formal declaratory jurisdiction of this kind in New Zealand are, if anything, receding”. Conversely, Waldron predicted the New Zealand Supreme Court was “…heading in the direction of something like a UK-style Declaration of Incompatibility”; he was only a few months off and tellingly rights declarations are not limited to the New Zealand Supreme Court, but those lower down may be involved. Taylor adds to a lineage of courts self-regulating their power by extending rights protecting scope. In Baigent’s Case the view of the court, on finding that damages could be awarded as a remedy, or indeed that there were in fact remedies available, for a breach of BORA was summarized by Casey J. He noted that it would be odd if, in implementing BORA, Parliament intended citizens to fly to the United Nations for redress but not attend New Zealand courts. The judicial mechanism developed within the framework (BORA) to provide for “Ubi jus ibi remedium, where there is a right there is a remedy, [which] has a long history,” in New Zealand.

Heath J explicitly regulated outside of the lis in Taylor, and added definition to the relationship between citizen and State and the regulatory role of the court. Holding that “there is a need for a Court to fashion public law remedies to respond to the wrong inherent in any breach of a fundamental right”. It was, according to his Honour’s interpretation, the “clear” intention of Parliament for the courts to engage “in this type of quasi-political analysis required by that section”. Heath J, via Taylor, expanded the courts regulatory reach and like Mahon J before him, recognizing the solemnity of the occasion, performed his judicial function “without fear or favour”. This is a strong statement from a New Zealand judge. The case concluded with a declaration of inconsistency ordered, for this was the watershed moment, with Heath J reasoning that if a declaration (a discretionary... remedy) was not made, then “it is difficult to conceive of one when it would be”.168 The market for a remedy once thought “receding” is now on the rise.169

BUT A POOR MAN’S REMEDY?

And yet one may wonder what is the point, pragmatically, of a declaration of inconsistency. What function does it serve; does the declaration serve any rational or practical purpose? Bar the catharsis of airing grievances in public, what do stern words from the bench have, bar the practicalities that costs are likely to be awarded against the Crown.170 Will the public petition their MPs to remedy the, pro tanto, rights inconstant law? Probably not. Arthur Taylor is a member of a suspect class – over 150 convictions and a sentence end-date in 2022 is unlikely to merit majority sympathy.171 Is a declaration without a consummate order a poor man’s succor for a real remedy (such as mandamus, strike down, or damages)?

Contrast, from a regulatory perspective, the constitutional premise in Taylor (New Zealand) with the active protection premise in Obergefell (United States) as stated by Justice Kennedy; “An individual can invoke a right to constitutional protection when he or she is harmed, even if the broader public disagrees and even if the legislature refuses to act.”172 If the underlying constitutional protection for citizens is as enshrined in BORA,173 and the courts can do little but declare that right breached when a minority, prisoners, especially those who are non-violent and incarcerated for a period which happens to fall on polling day, then do New Zealanders have a right to constitutional protection? Clearly yes, as will be discussed, as it fell to Heath J to regulate the extent of protection. One still may ask whether how New Zealand regulates its fundamental rights in this instance is a regulatory failure?174 In terms of the court issuing mandamus, a remedy available in the United States, while rights have been breached this is not a tool normally within the New Zealand judicial armory. There is nothing stopping the legislature continuing to breach the right; indeed, the legislature repealing the infringing Act is unlikely – it is a Westminster style government policy.175 The courts foundational mechanism lies in regulating that breach, or the confines of it.

Taken to the extreme, should Parliament pass a capital punishment amendment to the Crimes Act,176 or, as Cooke theorized, require the courts to receive in evidence “… any statement appearing to be a confession of a crime, whether or not obtained by force or any other form of compulsion”.177 Is this the only “remedy” available: (a) Baigent’s damages

---

168 Ibid., at [77a].
169 Professor Andrew Geddis analyzed the judgment in his blog post on Pundit: Andrew Geddis, “Bliss That It Was Dawn to be Alive”, Pundit (24 July 2015) <www.pundit.co.nz/content/bliss-was-it-in-that-dawn-to-be-alive>; He also made similar comments to the Justice and Electoral Select Committee after Taylor and in the mainstream media, see Andrew Geddis, “Message on prisoner voting rights ‘unequivocal’”, New Zealand Herald (28 July 2015), www.nzherald.co.nz/opinion/news/article.
170 Taylor v Attorney-General, note 74 above, at [80].
173 Section 12, universal suffrage.
175 One of the most important features of a Westminster style Government is Executive majority in the legislature.
176 By reenacting/repealing ss 14-16 of the Crimes Act 1993.
(unhelpful to the damned) and or, (b) a declaration of inconsistency?178 Or would common law rights lie so deep?179 Significant in the New Zealand democratic dialogue is that the courts, by declaring an inconsistency, are sending a signal to the public/legislature/executive. A valid criticism is that three years is a long time between rights breach and elections,180 and this presumes that the democratic majority is prepared to protect the rights of the less than 49%. The Governor-General, through the reserve power safeguard is unlikely to refuse assent to a fundamental-rights infringing Bill.181 The courts are the last bastion to Government or majority rule rights infringement and as such, rights protector of the minority – of which have no less value in their rights being infringed than the majority. Judicial regulation of rights is a0 fundamental constitutional protection and part of the regulatory mechanism.

So can courts regulate the breach? Inherent in the New Zealand judicial mechanism is that, regardless of its efficacy or success in each instance, a declaration in Taylor will not allow Mr. Taylor to vote. Courts can choose their battles when seeking overall/aggregate rights equilibrium. Reintroducing capital punishment might be an infringement which the courts would be prepared to question Parliament’s ostensible sovereignty and go further than a declaration, prisoner disenfranchisement was not.182 However, there are reserve powers in the judicial armory, and it is a matter of public perception of the remedy awarded whether it is successful judicial regulation, but it is regulation nonetheless.

On the question of fundamental regulation of citizen rights qua the State Cooke asked of this “question of perennial fascination” – “is it at bottom only interpretation [in relation to Acts of Parliament] or is there something more?”183 His ultimate conclusion and concern was that there was something more, and this is in part what should be ascribed as unique to judicial regulation. Sir Robin concluded that “the Judge’s work is part of the pathology of society. With luck one can go through a judicial career without having to confront the really big choices about constitutional power”.184 He found it “ultimately an inescapable judicial responsibility”,185 not as “an incitement to judicial activism”,186 but to identify the fundamental rights and to protect them. This power within the judicial mechanism 178 Interpretation can be a remedy; such as reading down the offending statute so that it is rights compliant. However, this example is based on the premise that Parliament has drafted the statute in the strongest and clearest terms so that interpretation as rights consistent would not be possible; See Janet L. Hiebert, “New Constitutional Ideas: Can New Parliamentary Models Resist Judicial Domination When Interpreting Rights?”, Texas Law Review, LXXXII (2003-2004), p. 1963; J. McLean, “Legislative Invalidation, Human Rights Protection and s 4 of the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act”, New Zealand Law Review, (2001), p. 429-430.

179 As suggested by Cooke P in Taylor v New Zealand Poultry Board, note 114 above.
180 Electoral Act 1993, s 17: The three year term provision is entrenched by s 268 and can only be amended by a 75% majority in the House of Representatives, although s 268 itself is not double entrenched.
181 Governor-General Sir Anand Satyanand, “Speech to Launch Dame Catherine Tizard’s Memoirs” (Speech at Government House Auckland, New Zealand, 16 September 2010) available at <https://gg.govt.nz/content/cat-amongst-pigeons-book-launch>: Sir Anand reminded that audience of a “particular piece of legislation [that] did not appeal to Dame Cath at all. She asked the question of her responsible official and asked the question of herself and finally said (apparently). “All right, I will sign my assent, but I will do it in black ink!” A special bottle was obtained and used for the purpose!”; See also Gavin McLean, The Governors: New Zealand’s Governors and Governors-General (2006).
182 Cooke, note 177 above, p. 163.
183 Ibid., p. 159.
184 Ibid., p. 159.
185 Ibid., p. 165.
186 Ibid., p. 164.
lies in reserve, the ability to, in only rare instances limit legislative power.\textsuperscript{187} This is at the core of the judicial regulatory mechanism in New Zealand – that there is something more to “it” than other regulatory mechanisms. The judicial mechanism is entwined with the responsibility to protect constitutional and fundamental rights even at the expense of other norms such as legislative power. It can question its demarcated area. This is a responsibility to be used only on rare occasions and is distinct from all other regulators which may not step outside or question their regulatory area demarcations. Should the Commerce Commission attempt to regulate charities, it would experience a judicial review challenge on the grounds of \textit{ultra vires}.

There is uniqueness in the New Zealand judicial-regulatory dynamic when contrasted with the United States. As \textit{Taylor} exemplifies a vindication of the personal stake in the charter – occasionally breached – that in itself may be just as important as substantive remedy for the breach. For should mandamus be always available within the BORA framework (as opposed to being held in reserve for breaches of deep rights) than a fundamental norm of our system would have been dramatically altered; that parliament is sovereign in all but some reserve instances. Individuals in New Zealand need not await legislative action before asserting a fundamental right, but there are differing classes of rights which can be breached. Entwined in the judicial regulatory mechanism is an element of pragmatism. The various theories underlying the provision of protection to the infringed or “suspect classes” all subscribe to the view that what is infringed is, from a majoritarian perspective, framed as a “political” question as opposed to a constitutional question. This is further explored below. The regulator must act politically and pragmatically whilst still apportioning law and “rights” in the market – a declaration of inconsistency as awarded in \textit{Taylor} was the right balance.

\textbf{WALDRON’S PROCESS BASED APPROACH RENEWED TO JUDICIAL REGULATION}

Waldron’s Process Theory argues that political institutions are faced with “circumstances of integrity”\textsuperscript{188} because within diverse democracies passionate moral sentiments will differ.\textsuperscript{189} Rawls and Hume identified moderate scarcity and limited altruism as the circumstances of justice.\textsuperscript{190} When people invariably disagree about moral sentiments (for example euthanasia),\textsuperscript{191} then procedures and frameworks must be developed to address

\textsuperscript{187} Ibid., p. 164.
\textsuperscript{189} Ibid., p. 207.
\textsuperscript{190} Ibid., p. 198. See also; Hume, \textit{A Treatise of Human Nature} (1738), pp. 495–496 (Book III, Part II, s. ii), and also John Rawls, \textit{A Theory of Justice} (2005).
\textsuperscript{191} See \textit{Seales v Attorney-General} [2015] NZHC 1239; [2015] 3 NZLR 556: Although outside the scope of this article, it was highly likely that Ms. Seales would have had one of her BORA declarations granted (set out at [11]) should the \textit{Taylor} decision have occurred before her case was decided (she died the day before judgment was delivered). Central to Collins J’s decision was the conclusion that granting a declaration, and being the first to do so would “… provide me with a license to depart from the constitutional role of judges in New Zealand” [211], a role which was clarified post \textit{Taylor}. Ms. Seales’ claim was regarding the meaning of s 160(2)(a), (3) and 179(b) of the Crimes Act 1961, that “her doctor would not commit either murder or manslaughter … if she “administered aid in dying” to Ms. Seales” at [5], and that the court “issue declarations that the offence provisions of the Crimes are not consistent with two rights guaranteed by the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 (NZBORA). The rights in question are the “right not be deprived of life” and the right not to be “subjected the conflicts arising from those conditions and “in a manner that respect the fact of disagreement.” The fundamental rights procedure and framework for disagreements between government and citizen, in New Zealand, is judicial regulation by the court, within the confines of BORA and reserve remedies. It is important that judges are not instruments of popular will and are, when required converse to democracy: their BORA verdicts often are anti-majoritarian policy. Thus, the fact that New Zealand judges exist in their positions “un-democratic” and their adjudication can be anti-democratic is a vital feature of democracy itself. Parliament does not solely own “the democratic mantel.” The judiciary is the regulator for social justice and “circumstances of integrity” en mass when a lis of constitutional/rights distinction presents itself.

The judiciary can act both as a counter-weight to the abuses of government, executive branch, and also to the inherent majority swing of democracy; “all are partners in the common endeavor of representative government.” There are successive popular instances where the judiciary acts as the enforcer of the democratic will when it perceives the interpretation of rights is not reflected in the policy of the Government. An extrajudicial comment from Justice Blackmun, who wrote leading judgment in Roe v. Wade, expressed personal concern, and that of some of his brethren of pandering to perceived citizen majority influence:

How powerful – at least in my country – is the bench… I am struck indeed with the “awefullness” of that power…[the judiciary should] refrain from excessive use of that power and yet – yes – utilize it when it is necessary so to do …[there can be an] exercise of raw judicial power.

His colleague on the bench, Justice White remarked, “The system works, but why?” That the New Zealand judiciary lacks the “awefullness” of that power is cause for celebration and concern, especially should, if in instances of reserve, they need to exercise power and find it difficult to do so. The underlying sentiment from Justice Blackmun’s erstwhile need to pick the mood of the public and self-censor the “raw Judicial power” are manifestly overt political considerations, or in judicial parlance “policy considerations”. The New Zealand judiciary does not grapple with such considerations to the same degree because they lack the same outward power, although of necessity they may hold it on reserve.

Courts are often portrayed as “passive” in so far as they are “institutions” which can set their agendas “in only the most limited sense” as they respond to “actual controversies brought before them by real litigants”, the lis. This is incorrect in relation to courts in general, and to the New Zealand Supreme Court specifically. It has an institutional role, self-constructed, similar to the agenda-setting of the North American courts, United States Supreme Court and the Canadian Supreme Court. The New Zealand Supreme Court exercises discretionary jurisdiction choosing cases and shaping the law via lis’ of distinction – regulating outside the lis to effect constitutional change en mass.

West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette is a notable United States Supreme Court decision and an example of a court’s institutional role. The majority held that the freedom of speech clause in the Constitution granted protection from mandatory swearing-saluting allegiance to the flag. Justice Frankfurter in his minority dissent articulated a view not often seen in a court arbitrating constitutional decisions:

The tendency of focusing attention on constitutionality synonymous with wisdom, to regard a law as all right if it is constitutional. Such an attitude is a great enemy...

In his opinion there was something greater at stake than the fundamental rights of freedom of speech and expression provided for in the Constitution. Ergo the underlying fundamental charter of the United States may not always align with typical judicial concerns such as fairness, equity, justice, and wisdom. There may be at times a justifiable imbalance between State and citizen rights.

Frankfurter J’s Barnette dissent is most notable for explicit reference to his Judaic background as a way of preempting public criticism for not deciding along his presumed personal bias in supporting First Amendment rights. The group who refused to swear allegiance to the flag where religious minorities objecting on expression and religious grounds:

But [as to preempt criticism] as judges we are neither Jew nor Gentile, neither Catholic nor agnostic … As a member of this Court I am not justified in writing my private notions of policy into the Constitution … It can never be emphasized too much that one’s own opinions about the wisdom or evil of law should be excluded altogether when one is doing one’s duty on the bench.

It is an explanation of which J. A. G. Griffith would be skeptical, but one exemplified in and reminiscent of both Heath and Mahon JJ’s references to their judicial oaths.

Elias (Chief Justice of New Zealand), “Speech at the Special Sitting of the New Zealand Supreme Court” (Supreme Court of New Zealand, Wellington, 1 July 2004).

Evans and Fern, note 31 above, p. 55.

Ibid., p. 55.

There is no right of appeal to the Supreme Court, applicants must seek leave and the court picks cases in the public interest or of general importance in developing the law: Supreme Court Act 2003, s 13(1),(2). Lower courts can also exercise this institutional function by adjudicating many cases and picking particular judgments by which to shape the law.

319 U.S. 624 (1943).

The case is notable because the supremacy of the First Amendment right is highlighted, even with regards to something considered so very American and patriotic at a time when the country was at war.

As opposed to a market equilibrium, or indeed a new equilibrium, as the case may be.

The New Zealand Supreme Court regulated a comparable lis to Barnette, providing a similar exemplification of its institutional role. Yet it regulated in a decidedly different way in Valerie Morse v The Police, thereby highlighting a unique, almost indirect, but no less successful, regulatory mechanism. Ms. Morse burned the New Zealand flag on the grounds of the Victoria University of Wellington Law School in full view of the Cenotaph and Anzac (remembrance) day dawn war-memorial service. Arguing that her act was an expression of opinion protected by the freedom of expression clause in BORA, she was convicted in the District Court of “offensive and disorderly behavior”. Her appeals to the High Court and Court of Appeal were dismissed. The Chief Justice chose to grant the appeal, finding the charge and subsequent convictions based on “an erroneous understanding of what constitutes offensive behavior”. Tipping J referred to BORA only in passing. He found that “… those affected are required, for the purpose of the necessary assessment, to be appropriately tolerant of the rights of others” but that whether the defendants conduct was offensive “in law” was a “contextual decision”. Only McGrath J found the behavior clearly offensive in terms of the charge, but “expressive conduct, which is protected by the right to freedom of expression”. He considered whether the limitation was justified per s 5 BORA and found that the charge was not warranted. Dr. Farmer, QC, who often appears before the Court, concluded that “The Supreme Court’s judgment in Morse must raise real questions of the ability of appellate judges who are far removed from the day-to-day world of ordinary New Zealanders to interpret and apply statutes that are said to embody New Zealand values” as “Anzac Day is part of the fabric of this Nation”.

This was not a judgment, similar to that as expressed by the Court of Appeal – Bill of Rights Freedom of Expression versus Disorderly Conduct Flag Burning – but of contextual analysis of the charge “objectively assessed”. The result from a constitutional/rights perspective, however, was that Ms. Morse had the charges against her dismissed. The citizen-majority do not always appreciate the protection of rights, and the judgment has been described as “caustic” for allowing the Morse expression. Reminiscent of Frankfurter J’s Barnette dissent, Thomas J, a retired member of the Supreme Court bench, writing extra judicially under judicial alias as High Court Justice Athena J, in an article derisively titled Bonkers and Ors v The Police, said it was a case:

… in which an impoverished amoral concept of “public order” is judicially ordained; a law in which the right to freedom of expression trumps – or tramples upon – other rights… to which individuals and minorities may be exposed to uncivil, and even odious, ethic, sexist, homophobia, anti-Christian, anti-Semitic, and anti-Islamic taunts providing no public disorder results… a law which demeans dignity… a law in which the mores or standards of society are set without regard to the reasonable expectations of citizens in a free and democratic society… [T]hat is beyond the pale in a civil and civilized society.

Evans and Fern, perhaps in defense of the Supreme Court’s conscious decision not to adjudicate Morse on rights grounds as one of the great social issues of the day, argued that the Court is in its “capital building years, and, “in future, it is conceivable that political conflict … and the institutionalization of judicial power may combine in ways that make for a more assertive Supreme Court”. New Zealand and United Kingdom courts do not typically display the linguistic candor of Athena J, even though her Honour came down on the opposing side of the rights divide. Perhaps one-day dissents of the ilk of Frankfurter J, Athena/Thomas J, the rights asserting decisions as in Obergefull or the majority in Barnette who protected freedom of speech/expression will flow from the bench – that is once the New Zealand court becomes more assertive of its regulatory role.

The Morse decision was popularized as “Ruling makes flag burning legal, says expert”. The expert, Bill Hodge of Auckland University was quoted as saying “You can now burn the New Zealand flag any time, anywhere you like”. That would be the case if the court had held that the protection of freedom of expression reigned supreme, as the US SC did in Barnette, but it did not. The Court held that the “case was distorted by failure to identify the meaning of the provision [of the Summary Offences Act] in issue” and it was not “… confident on the evidence that a conviction could properly have been entered [as the behavior was not] assessed as objectively disorderly”. In no way has flag burning been made legal, on the contrary as long as it is objectively disorderly or provocative (for example, had Ms. Morse been situated on the Cenotaph or consecrated grounds not across the road at the Law School) it is still illegal in black-letter law. However the regulatory effect, sotto voce, is that the Police (as a branch of the executive) will now no 223 Farmer, note 218 above, p. 87.

---

224 The name “Athena J” no doubt chosen as a clear homage to a feminine judicial embodiment of judicial wisdom, sans gendered first name.
226 Evans and Fern, note 31 above, p. 58.
229 Bill of Rights Act 1990, s 14.
230 Valerie Morse v The Police, note 28 above, at. [58] per Elias CJ.
232 “Soft voice”. The result was that the Court sent a direction to the Executive Branch, the Police, in sotto voce, longer charge a citizen with an offence for burning the flag, and the pragmatic results of Barnette contrasted with Valerie Morse are the same. Both courts issued clear directions to the executive branches, but with different regulatory dialogue.

PRIVACY RIGHTS AND REGULATION OUTSIDE BORA

The judiciary also regulates rights in lis’ Citizen v Citizen, which have writ large aggregate effect on society as a whole. Courts no longer “find and declare the law”, and there is wide recognition of the judicial function of law making. The common law is not a library yet to be catalogued by the judiciary. With that comes recognition that the judicial decision is therefore dependent on both the inclination of the judge and the traditions of the society. Due to the system of precedent, the outcomes of disputes are shaped by previous disputes, and thus the role of the court in the society is influenced by the nature of previous disputes, stare decisis, brought before them. An expansion of the judicial role in society, especially with regards disputes of rights and public policy, plays an important regulatory function and therefore the judiciary’s role cannot be underestimated.

Sir Geoffrey Palmer, himself as Attorney-General recommending over forty-eight judicial appointments, stated:

> It is clear that as the chief expositors, applicators and significant developers of the laws, the Judges must be regarded as important. They are important because the law is important...they make the legal rules in a not inconsiderable number of instances which will be applied to future conduct.

Going further than Sir Geoffrey, the judiciary as a class often make the legal rules, either primary or secondary. They interpret and they apply them to the fact patterns before them and give directions either via precedent or obiter for future applicability. They can create tests or develop new areas of law to further regulate conduct. This is evidenced in the area of privacy law, first by Hosking v Runting where the Court of Appeal accepted that there was a common law tort of privacy in New Zealand. No tort existed before; the court created the two-part test of the reasonable expectation of privacy and the publicity of facts highly objectionable to the reasonable person. The Court’s overall regulation of social conduct was subject to the defense of legitimate public concern/interest emanating from the right of freedom of expression. Subsequently Whata J in the High Court, faced with a similar yet distinct situation where there was no publicity of objectionable content, held that the New Zealand common law should recognize a tort of intrusion into

---

234 Ibid., p. 468.
237 Hosking v Runting & Others, note 134 above.
238 Ibid., at [45]-[49], [108]-[116].
239 Ibid., at [117], [129]-[130].
seclusion and created both the tort and test for it.\textsuperscript{240} Before Hosking or C v Holland\textsuperscript{241} New Zealand law did not know of either civil actions nor had suitable remedies available to victims/plaintiffs harmed. The legal answers, substantive rights for wrongs committed, were judicial creations, wholly legitimate responses to social conduct unbecoming in New Zealand society. Creatures of common law permitted and informed by the New Zealand constitution, in so far as such creatures could be created and the creature, privacy, was recognized as a right. Therefore what matters is, in doing so, by not just effecting remedies (as is the accepted norm) but by creating rights, is where do judicial officers see themselves within the constitutional framework? An answer postulated by Griffith is that:\textsuperscript{242}

It is the creative function of judges that makes their job important and makes worthwhile some assessment of the way they behave, especially in political cases. It must be remembered that in most cases for most of the time the function of the judge...is to ascertain the facts. But when question of law do arise, their determination may be of the greatest importance because of the effect that will have on subsequent cases...

Should C v Holland not have appeared on Whata J’s civil list that day then the regulation of our social conduct may be very different – in that specific sphere it may still be unregulated. For if the Judge who heard the case had not seen it as his judicial function to regulate good social mores and conduct in an area where parliament would no\textsuperscript{243} then neither the tort would exist but a wrong\textsuperscript{244} would go forth without a remedy: an important declaration that admonishing said conduct would be missed. Moreover the “manner” that the judiciary respects and responds to civil/social disagreement, as Waldron identifies, the process theory, is an equally important judicial function,\textsuperscript{245} as indeed is judicial regulation of society and social conduct between citizens. The judicial regulatory mechanism is not just limited to constitutional matters and rights adjudication between citizen and State but extends into the commercial sphere.

ILLUSTRATION: THE EARLY POLITICAL JUDGE THROUGH COMMERC

Every practicing barrister knows before which judges he would prefer not to appear in a political case...This however is to say little more than that, as we have already remarked, judges are human with human prejudices. And that some are more human than others...But if that were all we would expect to find a wide spectrum of judicial opinion about political cases. Instead, we find a remarkable consistency of approach in these cases concentrated in a fairly narrow part of the spectrum of \textsuperscript{240} C v Holland, above n 134, at. [94].

\textsuperscript{241} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{242} Griffith, note 207 above, p. 17.
\textsuperscript{243} By creating a civil regime for breach of privacy, this did not occur in part until the Harmful Digital Communications Act 2015.
\textsuperscript{244} The “wrong” in C v Holland as explained in the judgment was that Mr. Holland had hidden a camera in the ceiling cavity above the shower and recorded Ms. C showering and then watched theses videos for his own gratification. Ms. C was horrified when an acquaintance discovered the videos on Mr. Holland’s laptop.
\textsuperscript{245} Waldron, note 102 above, p. vii; Waldron, note 188 above, p. 191.
political opinion. It spreads from that part of the center which is shared by right-wing Labour, Liberal and “progressive” Conservative opinion.246

J. A. G. Griffith The Politics of the Judiciary (1977)

In this example the Judiciary are vested with wide scope to act as Parliament’s political regulators. They regulate specifically in a commercial private rights arena, having an effect wider than the singular lis in the particular inter se dispute. They are rights regulators in a non-constitutional lis.

In 1956, the Restrictive Practices Court was established in the United Kingdom.247 Its function was an early precursor to anti-competitive practices tribunals and it was to provide “… for the registration and judicial investigation of certain restrictive trading agreements, and for the prohibition of such agreements when found contrary to the public interest”.248 Comprised of a mixed bench of High Court judiciary and lay businessmen, its scope was wider than later competition regulation under the New Zealand Part 2 of the Commerce Act 1986, and indeed is its current United Kingdom iteration. The court could void restrictive competitive agreements between businessmen on the criterion that “… a restriction is deemed to be contrary to the public interest unless the court is satisfied that it is reasonably necessary or that its removal would be more harmful to the public than its retention”.249

Griffith identified a decidedly “political” case in the courts tenure, in Re Yarn Spinners Agreement,250 only the second case ever heard by this court. Precursors to the Act contained no concrete definition of what was or was not in the public interest.251 This nebulous void was of little concern to the House of Commons. In the Commons many of the debates focused on the establishment of the “special court of law” to adjudicate on the validity of restrictive agreements; that is, were they within the public interest and thus permissible.252 The Conservative Government found it desirable that decisions concerning public interests aspects of trade were left to the judiciary, whereas the Labour opposition contended that such issues were non-justiciable and ought to be decided by the Minister (which ironically would have been a Tory Minister).253 A compromise was made, and the preamble to the Act provides vesting a special court with investigatory powers comprising a mixed bench of judges and laymen.254

---

246 Griffith, note 207 above, p. 31.
248 Ibid., Preamble.
249 Griffith, note 207 above, p. 40.
250 In Re Yarn Spinners’ Agreement (No. 1) (1959) LR 1 RP 118; [1959] 1 All ER 299 (RTCP); [1959] 1 WLR 154.
252 (1956) 549 GBPD HC 1932.
254 Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1956 (UK), s 2 - 5. Although at the time the extent to which the laymen held sway can be doubted. To emphasize the success of this model lay business men and women in New Zealand can sit alongside High Court judges on certain matters brought under the Commerce Act 1986 per s 78. They did so in Wellington International Airport & Ors v Commerce Commission [2013] NZHC 3289 which at the time was New Zealand’s longest judgment at [1949] paragraphs. It concerned part 4 of the Commerce Act and the case was heard before Clifford J and lay members Mr. R. Davey and Mr. R. Shogren.
Every commercial practice that came before the court labored under a rebuttable presumption that it was contrary to the public interest. Section 20(1) provided the declaratory power of the court to hold any restriction (business agreement) as “… contrary to the public interest” and further void those restrictions. Although the Act listed several circumstances availing the business to argue that their practices were in the public interest, the court's wide discretion could outweigh any potential justification due to two specific clauses. First, the restriction must not be unreasonable and must be balanced against the detriment it inflicted on the public at large (not the benefit to the business or the industry) or third parties to the agreement. Second, there existed the “famous tailpiece” of the legislation, s 21.

Once the businessman has argued that his practice comes within one of the seven availing circumstances, the tailpiece of the legislation comes into operation. For the court to find in favor of the business it must be “… satisfied … that the restriction is not unreasonable having regard to the balance between those circumstances [the seven availing] and any detriment to the public or to persons not party to the agreement … resulting or likely to result from the operation of the restriction”. This is emphasized to highlight that in essence decisions as to whether a trade practice was “restrictive” had some consideration as to the effect on the market and yet judicial discretion outweighs this via a broad “tailpiece” of “any detriment to the public”.

In Re Yarn Spinners Agreement it was found that the price of yarn was higher than it would have been on the free-market. To avail this was the considerable localized unemployment that would result from ending the scheme, approximately 100,000 people in eleven areas. Notable of the courts political statements is the following finding:

We are satisfied that the industry can and ought to be made smaller and more compact...We cannot see why price invasion [from imports] is a bad thing or something which ought to be prevented; it is only one form of normal trade competition...Competition in quality is no doubt a benefit, but the removal of the restrictions would not prevent it. [Regarding unemployment]...But we are clear that once we have reached a conclusion of fact, it is our duty to disregard the consequences of our findings.

That the use of judges to make “… political and economic decisions was widely criticised in 1956” is hardly surprising. That eight years later the same court’s jurisdiction was extended by the Resale Prices Act 1964 (UK) is even less surprising as the decisions that the court made (essentially trade liberalizing in Re Yarn Spinners) should they have 255 Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1956 (UK), s 20(3).

256 Section 21(1)(a)-(g).
257 Rhinelander, note 251 above, p. 30.
258 In s 21(1) the seven are; “public safety”, “public benefit”, small businessman (four and five), “unemployment”, “export”, “ancillary restrictions”.
259 Section 21(1) (final clause).
260 In Re Yarn Spinners’ Agreement (No. 1), note 250 above.
261 Rhinelander, note 251 above, p. 48.
262 Griffith, note 207 above, p. 41.
263 In Re Yarn Spinners’ Agreement (No. 1), note 250 above, Judgement of Mr. Justice Devlin p. 41.
264 Ibid.,
265 Ibid.,
been made by the Minister would have been deeply unpopular in the electorate but necessary for the economy overall. The Lord Chancellor, Lord Gardiner, that year referred to the Court and noted “… the increasing practice in the last ten years of employing Her Majesty’s Judges to perform tasks other than their ordinary tasks” and then added “I am not quite clear whether Her Majesty’s Judges have any special qualifications to determine what are really socio-economic question, but they have done well”.266 It is a trend that the judiciary has continued to excel at not just in areas of commerce, and they do not shy away from.

Griffith points to doubts regarding the infringement of judicial purity, the foray into the political arena, trade agreements, and concludes that the Restrictive Practices Court may have provided some precedent in judicial involvement in the field of industrial relations.267 More so than providing precedent, it is an example of judicial expansion in not only the regulating trade conduct (as opposed to contractual terms), which is not a traditional judicial function, but also Parliament expecting of them to perform “other than their ordinary tasks” more generally; that is, public policy regulation. In 1956 there existed a clear devolution of regulation from the House to the Court via the term “public benefit”. This phrase in a judicial setting is not unusual and indeed in the area of tort law and the duty of care it is bread and butter,268 but the context of its operation is noteworthy.269 Who better than to decide a politically unpalatable decision than a judge who is only disparately constitutionally responsive to the democratic will? But why is a judge deciding if free trade is for _pro bono publico_? Is the judge any better qualified to do so than the politician? If the judge is just as qualified, than as Griffith argues, they must also be political actors in adjudicating economic questions of “public benefit” and in carrying out this regulatory function.

The authority for the judges on the Restrictive Practices Court to make decisions came from Parliament, a devolution, and yet without that legislative grant it is hard to found the power on any constitutional ground. Trade, in the _Re Yarn Spinners_ example, is the realm of the executive. One academic noted in 1960 that this separate court was a “unique experiment”270 in a discrete area of law. In 1956 it was considered responsible for a “special court” to be established, for fear that a normal Court of Queens Bench would be “tainted” were it to make economic decisions in the public interest. Now, however, the separation requirement does not exist; all courts are equally suited to regulate in what was once considered demarcated special areas.271 The Lord Chancellor noted at the final reading

266 (1964) 258 GBPDL HL 835, 836.
267 Griffith, note 207 above, p. 41.
269 Louis Blom-Cooper QC, Brice Dickson, and Gavin Drewry, _The Judicial House of Lords_ (2009), p. 216: Commenting on Lord Reid’s famed refute in _Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd_ [1970] UKHL 2 to the suggestion as raised in _Williams v. State of New York_ 127 NE 2d 545 (1955), 550 at [15], of the “stoutness of heart among New York Prison authorities” by saying “… But my experience leads me to believe that Her Majesty’s servants are made of sterner stuff” and found in favor of a duty of care.
270 Rhinelander, note 251 above, p. 56.
271 Even with regards to patents, where there exists a specialized tribunal adjudicated by a Commissioner, a specific right of appeal exists to a non-specialized High Court: Patents Act 2013, s 214. Litigation at first instance can be conducted before the Intellectual Property Office of New Zealand at significant costs savings (but does not have to be), Patents Act 2013, Part 4; See also s 92 “Opposition to grant of patent” where a hearing is held in front of a Commissioner but an appeal is before the High Court. Unlike the United Kingdom, in New Zealand of the bill that it was “... an example of the dynamic use of the law” and “... one which provides for those affected the best machinery for arriving at the truth and reaching justice which the world has so far devised”. The conceptualization of truth and justice has also changed; what is “truth” was once factual, now it is court policy making, regulating social conduct. Courts in a dispute between the Crown, acting on behalf of the aggregate public, and private businessman (the restrictive practice) now decide the correct/just public interest of that agreement. The courts are apparently the best machinery for doing so, even though such a question is political in nature. Audi alteram partem, where the other side is now the public at large and the judicial decision is no longer one just of the fact of record and correct law but regulatory due to its “... capacity for standard-setting ... [And the] capacity for behavior-modification to change the state of the system”. Therefore the regulatory mechanism extends far beyond rights adjudication in the constitutional arena, and in commerce, the operation of the mechanism as in lis’ constitutional, is political in nature.

ILLUSTRATION: JUDICIAL REVIEW
AS JURIDICAL POLITICAL REGULATION

“The Orthodox View”

Standard public law texts do not usually admit the relationship between law and political science... the majority do their utmost to separate law from its political context. The dominant view has been that law is not a branch of political science, a view accepted by lawyers and political scientists alike.

Harlow and Rawlings, Law and Administration (1997)

An exposition of a new judicial regulatory mechanism focusing on rights and regulating constitutional norms would be lacking if it did not end without touching on Judicial Review. Judicial review is the ultimate form of judicial regulation over public functionaries. The core rational of Judicial Review in the twenty-first-century is summarized as “the reasonable and political judge upholding the rule of law". Professor Waldron comments that the establishment of the New Zealand Supreme Court "has not lead to anything remotely like a judicial revolution" and that “it has not approached [Rights/BORA matters] in the excess of activist enthusiasm that some politicians expected”. This is not to say that in the aforementioned regulatory exposition society should “underestimate the importance of straightforward business-as-usual affirmations of the rule of law there is no specific High Court list for patent appeals – they go on the general commercial list.

(1956) 199 GBPD HL 350.

Valerie Morse v The Police, note 28 above: where the Supreme Court decided that the behavior – burning the flag on ANZAC day, was socially acceptable, as it did not meet threshold of the charge of “offensive behavior”.

A fundamental principle of natural justice; “listen to the other side”, or “let the other side be heard”.

Hood, note 90 above, p. 23.

Harlow and Rawlings, note 236 above, p. 1.

Waldron, note 102 above, p. vii.

Ibid., p. xi.
by our courts, even when that does not involve the pyrotechnics of judicial review”.\textsuperscript{280} Lord Cooke has highlighted “the historical fact that what is now called judicial review long preceded democracy [parliament] …”\textsuperscript{281} Judicial Review, or regulating the rule of law, was a political exercise vis-à-vis \textit{Citizen v Sovereign}, long before there were elected politicians. Judicial review is not just political but is regulatory in nature. Because such review commonly focuses on judges reviewing actions of the executive branch, or public functionaries carrying out the policies of politicians, it is no longer controversial to reject the orthodox view and label judicial review a political exercise, even if traditional notions of an apolitical judicial function would find this recognition “unpalatable”.\textsuperscript{282}

Detached separation between political and judicial spheres, to the English orthodoxy, was originally considered to buttress rule of law arguments, as “legal ideas were invisible in the elaboration of political argument”.\textsuperscript{283} This gave the former purity and legitimacy. Regulatory scholars Hancher and Moran concluded in the late 1980s that “In the UK especially, law has not been viewed as the great interpreter of politics”.\textsuperscript{284} Hansard was not to be cited in Court even on matters of Parliament’s intent, and this position only changed in the early 1990s.\textsuperscript{285} This illogical separation between legal and political spheres was idealistic, false and flawed as the “spheres” were never distinct. This purist “separation” of politics and law led to the above conclusions of regulatory scholars Hancher and Moran; Wade criticized the purists:\textsuperscript{286}

\begin{quote}
But if the price of preserving the purity of constitutional law is that one must ignore the political pros and cons of what are, after all our most essential laws, then I would say that the price is too high and the lack of realism is excessive. This is the world in which political scientists and economists have to live in any case.
\end{quote}

With respect to Hancher and Moran, the view that law was not, and should not be, an interpreter of politics, in their regulatory field has led to a lack of development of a judicial regulatory theory sitting outside of the discrete grounds of judicial review. Judicial Review is inherently a political exercise, regulatory in nature; room exists for a judicial regulatory mechanism, as argued in this article, to develop along rights and constitutional grounds separate from judicial review. Judicial review as a form of regulation emphasizes the reasonableness of the administrators’ action,\textsuperscript{287} whereas the judicial regulatory mechanism looks to the wider constitutional and rights implications of judicial adjudication – especially in cases which are not judicial review cases such as \textit{Taylor} or \textit{Valerie Morse}.

A classical liberal ideal is that judges are to act as arbiters between citizens and the State.\textsuperscript{288} This administrative law principle flows through to the regulatory mechanism. Throughout this article the example of a \textit{lis} of distinction has been used, which might be a \textit{lis} between \textit{Citizen v State}. Examples provided were \textit{Taylor} and \textit{Valerie Morse}. Neither were strictly judicial review cases; however, both were rights/constitutional and had the

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item \footnotesize{Ibid.}
\item \footnotesize{Lord Cooke, note 75 above, p. 275.}
\item \footnotesize{Ibid.}
\item \footnotesize{Ibid., citing Sir Cecil Carr, \textit{Concerning English Administrative Law} (1941), pp. 10-11.}
\item \footnotesize{Hancher and Moran, note 43 above, p. 65.}
\item \footnotesize{Pepper v Hart [1993] AC 593 (HL), p. 638-639, 644-649.}
\item \footnotesize{Sir William Wade, \textit{Constitutional Fundamentals} (1989), p. 2.}
\item \footnotesize{In any sense or use of the word political; of or relating to the affairs of people, the government, country.}
\item \footnotesize{Harlow and Rawlings, note 236 above, p. 3.}
\end{enumerate} \end{footnotesize}
flavor of the judiciary checking legislative/executive power against rule of law principles. Griffith radically called into question the idea of apolitical legal behavior as “... the idea of apolitical law is itself political”, 289 yet there is a seemingly inherent conflict with judges acting simultaneously as purely neutral “legal” arbiters and as political actors in both judicial review and by extension in judicial regulation in further fields. Intrinsic to the rule of law is the separation between judicial and political powers; 290 ascribing to the judiciary political powers in regulation is an apparent conflict. Yet by comparison, in tort law political statements can subsist under the guise of “policy” arguments. This questions the term “politics”, and perhaps with regards judicial regulation we should think of the word de novo. Indeed even in a lis outside of the constitutional realm, scope can be found for legitimate judicial policy making - in the form of regulations: 291

Law plays an important role in shaping political behavior in liberal democracies, but it is often assigned an especially significant role with respect judicial behavior.

Lord Denning, MR, in a case concerning the duty of care in a tort lacking any precedent decided, with “refreshing candor”292 that, “In the end”, “it will be found to be a question of policy, which we, as judges, have to decide”. 293 Therefore is the rule of law as administrative law incorrectly associated with the idea of a politically neutral judiciary and is it all the more important that when the judiciary regulates conduct we consider it as such? The answer is affirmative, as “the price is too high and the lack of realism is excessive” by not recognizing the key political-regulatory function of judiciary. 294 The high price is akin to having blinkers on at a crossroads. Thomas J recognized this, concluding that a shift in approach is both needed and expected by the community: 295

The permanence of those principles and the enduring nature of the values underlying them are in danger of being obscured if the shift in judicial approach is not anchored in the changing needs or expectations of the community.

Judicial regulation, its development and its recognition, is commensurate with the new judicial résumé, society expects and calls for “independent and active judges”, 296 and in turn judges fulfill the role. The eighteenth century guise of judges simply declaring law, as opposed to making it, is premised on the judiciary being politically neutral. 297 It is a premise which the judiciary do not ascribe to, and nor does society expect them to do so.

A jurisprudential scholar postulated from high theory that “The courts are the capitals of law’s empire, and judges are its princes”. 298 This creates an image not unlike judicial review, and the classical English viewpoint, even expanded to judicial regulation, that “[the rule of 289 Griffith, note 207 above; Harlow and Rawlings, note 236 above, p. 3.

290 Ibid., p. 3; Michael Oakeshott, Rationalism in Politics and Other Essays (1962), p. 41.
291 Evans and Fern, note 31 above, p. 35.
292 Wade, note 286 above, p. 79.
294 Wade, note 286 above, p. 78.
296 Ibid., p. 378.
297 Harlow and Rawlings, note 236 above, p. 3; See also H. Laski, A Grammar of Politics (5th ed.; 1967), ch. 10, fn. 1.
298 Dworkin, note 132 above, p. 407.
law is] somehow neutral and impartial, “above” both ruler and party politics”299 quickly withers away. “Today no apology is needed for talking openly about judicial policy”300 with regards both judicial review, a traditional form of judicial regulation on conduct, and the new judicial regulatory theory as advanced in this article. Common law courts, like other classical regulators, regulate directly, and the judiciary regulates specifically in their self-demarcated domain, the rights and constitutional arena, often regulating wider than the lis in particular inter se disputes. An exposition of Judges as regulators would not be possible without recognition of the burgeoning taxonomy of administrative law, or a realisation of the political judiciary.

CONCLUDING REMARKS:
JUDICIAL REGULATION PART OF NEW ZEALAND CONSTITUTIONAL NORMS

If the New Zealand Constitution is a “… reflection of our national culture”, 301 then by circular definition the national culture is informed by the judicial regulatory mechanism. As the national culture evolves, then so too is the “open-textured” constitution amended. Intrinsic in the judicial regulatory mechanism is that courts exercise substantial regulatory power, effecting society, far in excess of the lis. The regulatory mechanism is the protection of aggregate fundamental rights through legal actions. This regulatory mechanism can only be recognized with an understanding of the inherent political nature of the judicial regulatory enterprise.

National culture is influenced by its people, its regulation, and vice versa. Matthew Palmer suggests that there are ten people, influential constitutional actors, who interpret and greatly influence the New Zealand Constitution,302 soft power, almost akin to those office holders in the United States sitting in the order of Presidential succession. He is not alone in expressing such a viewpoint. Ten years earlier in a predictably titled essay, The Suggested Revolution Against the Crown, Cooke P identified one reason why England would see a King William V on the throne:303

... that not for any juristic reason but simply because, as a writer in The Times, Nigella Lawson, put it: “Suspicion rather than hope is the national characteristic. Most people think that turning Britain into a republic will never turn the British into republicans.

The Nigella Lawson he referred to was, in 1995, not known for her culinary prowess, but as a Sunday Times writer and the daughter of Lord Nigel Lawson, the Tory Chancellor under Thatcher. Cooke P gives great weight the young Ms. Lawson’s constitutional insights and to the sway her opinion had over the English public. Matthew Palmer is correct that there are indeed key constitutional actors in New Zealand, he is specific in identifying ten, and yet of those who regulate the national culture – the norms and constitutional actors in the wider sense, there are many more.

299 Harlow and Rawlings, note 236 above, p. 3
300 Wade, note 286 above, p. 78.

There is a dilemma inherent in the New Zealand Constitution which the regulatory mechanism goes some way to solving: “Whether there are limits to the lawmaking power of the New Zealand Parliament has not [yet] been authoritatively determined”, 304 and throughout this article parliament has been described as “ostensibly sovereign” in constitutional and rights matters. It is a popular legal truism in the United States that “we are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is” 305 due to the documentary fundamentalism intrinsic in the judiciaries interpretative role of the United States Constitution. That is also a realization even more applicable to the New Zealand legal landscape then most New Zealand lawyers would admit, as, regarding judicial regulation of constitutional norms, “the systems [in the United States and in New Zealand] seem to be operating in much the same way”. 306 The New Zealand constitutional dilemma is apparent in the views of the New Zealand Chief Justice: “In New Zealand at least, claims of judicial supremacism seem rather odd”, 307 but that by and large “Parliamentary sovereignty is an inadequate theory of our constitution [...].” This does not mean that when adjudicating constitutional questions the New Zealand judiciary could not be activist – but this must be measured against the “somewhat indeterminate nature of the constitutional enterprise in New Zealand”. 308 The judicial regulatory mechanism is a better viewpoint.

Joseph has argued that Parliamentary Sovereignty is an inadequate explanation of the relationship between Courts and the Executive/Legislature within the New Zealand Westminster democracy. 309 The Constitution is not a power play between political and judicial forces; the reality is that the Courts accept Parliament’s power to effect legal change through legislation and Parliament accepts the judicial power to adapt its legislation to the fact patterns of the lis. 310 This is, as Lord Woolf held, cognizant with the “wider constitutional principle of mutuality of respect between two constitutional sovereignties”. 311 In particular Joseph finds that the traditional model of parliamentary sovereignty can be reconciled with the expanded judicial functions under modern human rights instruments, such as BORA or the ECHR. Parliament has given the courts the responsibility to vindicate the rule of law and to protect citizens from unjustified interference. Thus the exercise of power sharing shows the different branches engaging in a “collaborative enterprise”. 312 A recognition of the collaborative enterprise is necessary for judicial regulatory mechanism’s theoretical development insofar as it is not viewed as illegitimate judicial supremacism.

304 Elias CJ, note 126 above, p. 15; as presented by The Rt. Hon Dame Sian Elias, “Another Spin on the Merry-Go-Round” (A Series on Sovereignty in the 21st Century, organized by the Institute for Comparative and International Law at the University of Melbourne, Australia, 19 March, 2003).
306 McLean, note 178 above.
310 Ibid., p. 333.
311 Hamilton v Al Fayed [1999] 3 All ER 317, p. 320.
312 Joseph, note 6 above, p. 332.
The New Zealand Constitution, unwritten, evolving, falls to the judicial branch, the judicial mechanism, to be regulated; this is “the courts contribution”. It is a difficult question as to the courts legitimate exercise of judicial discretion and regulating outside the lis and inter se disputes. The judicial mechanism is, in part, a wide variegated standard setting mechanism, existing both inside and outside the lis. It operates within the exchange of a “rights” market, where courts fulfill their role as the neutral adjudicator branch of government, but manifestly informed by constitutional norms. Standard setting is key in both regulatory function and regulatory definition. The mechanism, and thus the common law courts as regulators, under the New Zealand model of an unwritten constitution is an exercise in the discretionary judicial function; “allow[ing] a distinction to be made between more or less preferred states of the system”, what the system is, what the State or society is, and indeed an extempore ability to “change the state of the system” by behavior modification, either incrementally or writ large. In not every case will a judicial decision be judicial regulation. Many cases together can act as incremental movement towards the setting of new standard, whereas others – most clearly those in the BORA or constitutional realm will be explicit.

The limits of common-law courts as regulators are defined by the courts capacity for behavior modification, to change the state of the system. Common law courts, like other classical regulators, regulate directly. The judiciary regulates specifically in the rights and constitutional arena wider than the lis in particular inter se disputes.

This article is by no means an attempt to observe that Parliament and the Executive do not regulate, that is a fortiori, or that regulation is the exclusive realm of the judiciary. It seeks to expose and address a new typology of judicial regulation through the mechanism of the courts. Although this authors’ concept of a judicial regulatory mechanism may seem limitless, it is restricted in the limits, which exist, in the legal system for which the mechanism operates. Parliament is supreme in New Zealand up to a point; the courts and judiciary often question this. Our Sovereign in right – her heirs and successors via a Governor-General have prerogative and reserve powers, and citizens have fundamental rights existing both in statute and pre-existing in common law inherited from the Laws of England. The relationship between the Crown and Maori is governed by the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi. These are but a small selection of New Zealand’s “open textured” constitutional norms.

Joseph is convincing when he concludes that there exists such collaboration between the two branches (Government/Judiciary) which thereby “transcends the language of 313 Barak, note 1 above, p. 449.

314 Hood, note 90 above, p. 23.
315 Ibid.
316 Taylor v New Zealand Poultry Board, note 114 above; Elias CJ, note 126 above, at fn. 52.
317 Oaths and Declarations Act 1957, s 17: Members of Parliament must take the s 17 Oath of Allegiance under Standing Orders 12(e), and may withdraw if they do not take the oath (13(1)). The Oath reads “I, ..., swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second, Her heirs and successors, according to law. So help me God”.
318 The Bill of Rights Act 1990.
319 Section 28: these pre-existing common law rights whilst almost all inherited from the Laws of England, does not remove the possibility that New Zealand may have developed distinct common law rights of its own between 1840 and 1990.
320 As interpreted by the principles in the Lands Case, note 60 above.
321 Haneghan, note 50 above.
Leviathan – of sovereignty, supremacy and subordination”.322 It is mostly for the judiciary to manage the domain of rights as a regulatory exercise, “the legislative role of the Courts is interstitial … [Courts] effect just and efficient legislative outcomes in ways that reconcile the institutional values of the legal system”.323 This is not to say Parliament does not play a large role and might fundamentally alter the texture, or indeed remove in entirety any one or all of them, including abrogating parts of the common law. Should Parliament do this, or New Zealand move down the road of republicanism, there would be such a fundamental change in the New Zealand system that indeed judicial regulation could be limited (or expanded if we had supreme law), but only because the underlying fundamental norm of the system has changed.324 A new system of law in New Zealand would take its place;325 a new constitutional makeup and a cognizant new judicial regulatory mechanism would develop.326 The regulatory role of courts in New Zealand is part of the security of that country’s constitutional balance.

322 Joseph, note 6 above, p. 345,
323 Ibid., p. 345.