

Clinical significance

It is feasible to deliver and evaluate an intervention to reduce workplace sitting in office employees. The intervention demonstrated potential benefits for reducing occupational sitting, increasing adherence to workplace sedentary behaviour guidelines and improving ecological momentary assessed workplace productivity. This can inform occupational health and workplace productivity policies.